Acknowledgements

The idea behind this volume originates from the awareness of the deep crisis of the Italian university system and the various calls for reforms happening there as well as over Europe and beyond. During long discussions about this crisis and the feasible solutions, we became aware of the need for a thorough exploration of the reform process under way in Italy and in Europe. This volume represents our attempt to collect different views on this process and, by this, to develop solutions for the situation in Italy.

Our emotional involvement as Italian academics (even though two of us have only minor involvement in the Italian university) has progressively shifted towards a research interest in the transition of the university system as a sign of the changing role of university in society. For this reason, we organized an international workshop in Venice (May 2006), at the Fondazione Giorgio Cini, to convene scholars, researchers, policy makers, and business people and discuss the role of universities in society and the economy. This volume is the outcome of the reflections made during the workshop.

As the volume is the outcome of an articulated research reflection, we need to thank many people for this undertaking. Firstly, we thank all the participants who took part in the Venice workshop and those who then also contributed to the realization of this volume. Their discipline and respect of all deadlines have been a key asset to finalize this collective endeavour.

Secondly, we are grateful to the European Institute for Advanced Studies in Management (EIASM) in Brussels, the Centre CRESCO and the University of Siena for the institutional support (also financial in CRESCO’s case) for both the international workshop in Venice and the previous edition held in Siena in 2004 on the same matters. In particular, we wish to thank Gerry Van Dijk, Nicole Coopman and Graziella Michelante from EIASM, Hazel Fry, from the University of Oxford, Antonella Casamonti and Federico Barnabè, from the University of Siena, for their help in managing the workshop and in preparing this volume.

Special thanks also go to the Fondazione Giorgio Cini of Venice, which hosted the 2006 workshop and provided a wonderfully inspiring venue for reflections and debate. In particular, we wish to thank the Foundation’s Secretary General, Pasquale Gagliardi, for welcoming us in Venice and also for the thoughtful afterword in this volume.
As the volume has benefited from the exchange of ideas on the future of the university started in Venice, we would like to thank all those scholars and colleagues who shared this research path with us and who provided critical comments and suggestions. Among them, we particularly wish to mention Kari Raivio (University of Helsinki) for his support throughout the project and his thoughtful foreword. We also wish to thank Kerstin Sahlin (University of Uppsala), Santiago Iñíguez (Instituto de Empresa, Madrid) and Roberto Battiston (INFN, Rome, and University of Perugia) for their kind and helpful comments and remarks.

We have also had the pleasure of sharing our research interest in university reform with Marc Ventresca (University of Oxford). We have benefited greatly from the time we spent discussing and exchanging emails with him on the theoretical perspectives about universities as institutions.

We wish to thank Ben Booth and Francine O’ Sullivan from Edward Elgar, for their patience in managing all the legal issues and in waiting for the various versions of this volume. Finally, the effort to finalize this work would have been meaningless without the assistance and emotional support of Angela, Sabrina and Rebecca, who patiently bore all our long phone calls, research trips and internet chats to organize the workshops and discuss and frame the volume. To them and to Gianluigi, Giulia and Vittoria this volume is wholeheartedly dedicated.

If this volume still presents errors and misunderstandings despite this wonderful array of collaboration, the fault lies with no one but us.
