Acknowledgments

It is no exaggeration to say that this book would not have been possible without the help of several important individuals. I owe them an enormous debt of gratitude. The book began as my doctoral dissertation at George Mason University, so I must first express my deep thanks to my dissertation committee director, Dr Karen Vaughn. In addition to successfully (and with great patience) guiding my dissertation process to completion, Professor Vaughn also had the greatest influence on my learning in graduate school. The years I spent as her research assistant and the two classes I took with her taught me how to be a successful heterodox economist as well as what is important and distinctive about Austrian economics. I would also like to thank the rest of my committee, which consisted of Drs Richard Wagner, Peter Boettke, and John Crockett. I greatly appreciate their guidance and comments. Broader thanks must also go to the George Mason University graduate program, which has provided me with an education that was exactly what I was seeking. My years there have set my intellectual path for the rest of my years, and I am grateful to all of my faculty there, especially to those from whom I learned so much about the amazing insights of Ludwig von Mises and Friedrich Hayek, economists who have provided the foundation for all my economic understanding.

My dissertation would never have become a book if it had not been for Dr Peter Boettke. I had not even considered attempting to turn it into a book and publish it until he suggested it to me. He also recommended my work to Edward Elgar Publishing, which led to this publication. Professor Boettke’s influence on my life goes beyond this, though. In addition to owing a great intellectual debt for all I have learned from him through the years as well as having him on my dissertation committee, it is his unceasing energy to promote as well as to do good economics that has been a true inspiration. I am also very grateful for his excellent foreword.

My sincere thanks must also go to Dr Richard Ebeling, a former colleague and a friend. His unmatched, encyclopedic knowledge and thought-provoking, insightful questions played a very important role in the development of this book. In addition, by pointing me to his own theoretical work on Alfred Schutz and intra-group co-ordination, he enabled me to make much greater sense of decentralization within firms than I would have otherwise. His suggestions led me to important breakthroughs at key junctures of my work, and I cannot thank him enough for this. He has also played a large role in my life, making possible many accomplishments that I probably would not have attained without him. In this, thanks must also go to his wife, Dr Anna Ebeling. I am happy and proud to call them both friends.

I have known Frederic Sautet since the mid-1990s, when we were both in the midst of our graduate studies. Our intellectual interests and backgrounds were very similar, and I have learned much from our many conversations through the years. His contributions to the theory of the firm, in particular how intra-firm structures affect the entrepreneurial responses by employees (as presented in his 2000 book), have also proved to be invaluable to my work. In addition, his detailed comments were absolutely fundamental in allowing me to convert a dissertation into a book, and tighten up my arguments and rhetoric. Finally, his unceasing enthusiasm for and faith in my work have been an important source of encouragement that allowed me to get through many doubts. As though all of that were not enough, he also wrote a very kind and wonderful foreword for this book. Words cannot express my gratitude for all of this.

I owe much of my initial insights into the topic of decentralization of decision-making within firms to my father, Ivan Pongracic, Sr. who provided me with many references and sources from management and business literature dealing with this topic. I have learned a lot from our many conversations on the topics of employee ‘empowerment’ and flattening of hierarchical structures. It is safe to say that my dissertation would have looked very different – if it were even ever to be finished – without his many suggestions, and I am deeply thankful.

I must also thank my colleagues in the Hillsdale College economics department, namely Gary Wolfram, Charles Steele, and Nikolai Wenzel, for being so helpful, accommodating, encouraging, enthusiastic, fun, and always interesting. You have made work much more pleasant and rewarding, and I thank you. Thanks must also go to everyone at Hillsdale College, especially the administration, for providing a stimulating, enjoyable, and supportive workplace and helping me in my many endeavors over the years. Special thanks also to my assistant Hannah Mead for her great help with the book index.

Finally, I must thank my wonderful wife, Christina Pongracic, as well as my parents, Ivan Sr. and Ana Pongracic, for their unceasing encouragement, bottomless patience, and support. I dedicate this book to you.
