This book grew from an idea we had when researching worker mobility and knowledge transfer. We felt there was much thoughtful work being done concerning the reform of intellectual property law generally. The collection we proposed would draw attention to the kind of reforms that in fact are worth considering, taking account of the changing context – that in fact are already being tried whether the orthodoxy has accommodated them as yet or not.

The contributors willingly responded to an invitation and came to a workshop at Bond University on the Gold Coast, with little more than the promise of a sunny sky outside the window of the Faculty of Law’s new resource centre. One came via videolink from early morning Dublin. Everything went smoothly (except for a lost wallet) because we were able to rely on Cherie Daye’s peerless organisation of the workshop. Then, we were much obliged to the contributors, our colleagues, for the timely and professional way they reworked their papers and responded to the requests of the editors. At this point, we were fortunate to obtain the assistance of Ginny O’Grady, who has done the copy editing at Monash so thoroughly and sensitively. In completing the volume, we should also like to thank Luke Adams, Nep Elverd and Joanne Betteridge at Edward Elgar for the confidence they have shown in the project. We acknowledge the crucial financial assistance that our Faculties, the Faculty of Business and Economics at Monash and the Faculty of Law at Bond, have given us.

We hope you find sustenance in the volume. A list of contributors is included in this book and we are sure they would be interested to discuss their ideas further. Please note that the law and policy are current as at the date of submission, September 2008.
