Acknowledgements

While carrying out this study, I have received considerable assistance from many people. First, I am grateful to NSW Legal Scholarship Support Scheme for providing me with financial assistance. I owe a great debt to the Dean of the UOW Faculty of Law, Professor Luke McNamara, for his encouragement and support throughout. I also thank numerous researchers, government officials and activists from India and Thailand who have kindly shared their information with me. It is difficult to list by name all the people who have helped me. Special thanks go to Professor Sol Picciotto (Lancaster University Law School), Professor N.S. Gopalakrishnan (Cochin University of Science and Technology), and Karin Timmermans (World Health Organization) for critically reading the manuscript and for their helpful comments.

I would like also like to thank Elizabeth White and the library staff of Wollongong University for their helpful library resources. Special thanks go to Elaine Newby for her detailed criticisms of the final draft of the book and her useful suggestions on the language used in this work. I have used some materials from a paper of mine entitled ‘Give the poor patients a chance: enhancing access to essential medicines through compulsory licensing’ which appeared in the Journal of Generic Medicines, Vol. 6, No.1, 2008. Thank you to Palgrave Macmillan for permission to use that material here. I also thank ICTSD and UNCTAD for permission to use the material in the report ‘Harmonisation of TRIPS-Plus IPR policies and potential impacts on technological capability: A case study of the pharmaceutical industry in Thailand’, which I wrote for the ICTSD-UNCTAD Project on IPRs and Sustainable Development.

I am greatly indebted to my wife, Chintana, my two daughters, Pirada and Peeraya, for their great patience, support and encouragement. Finally, my deepest love and gratitude to my beloved parents, Pratueng and Kwanjai, for everything they have contributed to my life.

Needless to say, any mistakes and errors in this book are my sole responsibility.
