This book began life as a doctoral thesis at the University of Glasgow. I am grateful to the staff and students of the Politics Department there for their support and encouragement. I am particularly indebted to my then supervisor, Chris Berry, for his calm guidance, his generosity and patience with me, and his professional impatience with anything that smacks of nonsense or hubris in political theory (and in PhD theses). My two doctoral examiners, John Barry and Paul Graham, were generous with their time and detailed in their criticisms, for which I am very grateful. Thanks in particular to John for his encouragement as a fellow green and his support of my post-PhD career.

The Economic and Social Research Council funded my doctoral research; I welcome the opportunity to record my gratitude to them, to the Carnegie Trust for the Universities of Scotland, who awarded me a Small Research Grant, and to the University of Glasgow, for financial support. I am also grateful to the British Academy, whose generous award of a Postdoctoral Fellowship has given me the breathing space necessary to transform the thesis into this book. My postdoc home is the Department of Politics at the University of York, a very hospitable place to ‘do’ political philosophy. I thank my new colleagues, in particular Sue Mendus, for welcoming me and encouraging me in my research. At Edward Elgar Publishing I am indebted to Felicity Plester, Laura Seward and all those who have worked on the book, as well as three initial reviewers, for their enthusiasm and professionalism.

Over the lifetime of this project, the following people have also helped at some point, in some way, and I am happy to have this opportunity to record my sincere thanks: Will Bain, Derek Bell, Antje Brown, Laura Cashman, James Chalmers, Rowan Cruft, Stewart Davidson, Andy Dobson, Katsu Furusawa, Mike Hannis, Tim Hayward, Simon Hope, Carl Knight, Peter McCaffery, Corey MacIvor, John O’Neill, Craig Smith, Neil Stammers, Marcel Wissenburg and Alasdair Young. Additionally, I thank the participants of the various conferences and research seminars where the ideas put forward in this book were first tried out. The book is much improved for the input of all those thanked here, but I claim for myself the credit for any remaining errors. Parts of the second and last chapters are based on work previously published in Res Publica and Environmental Politics, and I am grateful to Springer and to Taylor and Francis, respectively, for permission to reuse the material here.

Finally, I must record three personal debts: my thanks to the late Tony McManus, for convincing me that education wasn’t such a bad thing after all; my late grandmother, Catherine Paterson, whose attitude to my persisting in education so long was that I hadn’t really grown up yet; and Cristina Johnston, for patiently reading and commenting on the manuscript at several stages, and for much else besides.
