If writing this book has taught me anything, it is that the life of a research academic is a privileged one. One of the greatest privileges is the opportunity to work with thinkers and innovators both within universities and in industry. Many of the people who have helped me to make this book a reality have been working in China’s creative industries. Others have been writing about creative industries, digital technologies or the role of intellectual property as practitioners, teachers and students. All have displayed remarkable patience and kindness.

I am deeply indebted to my colleagues at Queensland University of Technology, particularly John Hartley, who provided me with the opportunity to pursue this research and the time and encouragement necessary to turn it into a book: the research on which this book is based was carried out while I was a post-doctoral research fellow on John Hartley’s Federation Fellowship programme, funded by the Australian Research Council and supported by Queensland University of Technology between 2007 and 2010; Jason Potts, for his willingness to collaborate and to provide new perspectives on the questions I have been tackling; Michael Keane, who helped to supervise the Ph.D. that got this project started; and Brian Fitzgerald, Stuart Cunningham, Terry Flew, Christina Spurgeon and Stephi Hemelryk Donald, all of whom I have worked with on China-related projects.

I would like to thank the people who so generously allowed me to interview them for my research. Without the good will of the film, music and fashion industry professionals, lawyers and judges who took time to answer my questions and share their perspectives this book really would not have been possible.

I am especially grateful to the research assistants who helped me during my fieldwork: Udom Tangjettanaporn, Helen Gao, Vincent Weifeng Ni and Jingwei Li. Some of the greatest fun I have had as a researcher has been a result of staying with colleagues and friends during fieldwork trips: Bao Jiannu, Jenny Spark and Sen Lee; I would also like to thank the people who have provided me with encouragement and support throughout my research journey, particularly Vikki Katz, Helen Klaebe, Marcus Foth, Shaun Chang and my fellow post-docs Jean Burgess and John Banks.

This book has largely been written while I have been based at City
University London, and I would like to thank my hosts here for their inspiration and support, particularly Malcolm Gillies. Also in London, I would thank Birgitte Andersen and the Birkbeck Centre for Innovation Management, as well as the staff and students at the University of Westminster’s China Media Centre.

Last, and by no means least, thank you to my family. I am especially grateful to my mother, Brenda Ford, who has been reading my drafts and providing feedback and encouragement for as long as I can remember. And thank you to Ben, for his patience and sense of humour.
