In the spring of 2008, I had the good fortune to serve as the Gilhuis Professor on the Future of Environmental Law at Tilburg University, and to deliver the lecture associated with the position. During my two months in residence at Tilburg, presentation of the lecture and numerous discussions with colleagues enabled this project to grow from a loose collection of ideas and research interests into this book length project. Tilburg provided the supportive setting, engaging and stimulating colleagues, and the time and support to pursue the project, which were crucial. So many colleagues were helpful and engaging that listing some risks serious omission of deserving others, yet I must specifically thank Professor Jonathan Verschuuren and Professor Kaas Bastmeijer for their exceptional help. Their colleague, the late Professor Piet Gilhuis, for whom the Professorship is named, was an inspiration for this project as well as a great friend and colleague.

My colleagues, students and support staff at the University of Connecticut School of Law have provided invaluable support for this project, as has been true for so many others. An intellectually stimulating and engaging setting in which to work is key. More than anything else, the Law School supplies supportive colleagues and students, who listen, engage, challenge, and inspire. Whatever the merits of one's work, they make it better. So many have been helpful that it runs a serious risk of omission to list any specifically. However, special thanks are due to Professor Peter Siegelman for his continual help, advice and support in sorting out what empirical study is, how it works, and what we can learn from it.

This project has also been blessed with the work of a succession of exceptional research assistants. Adam Denninger, Christina Sadlak, Eric Hisey, Eric King, and Alison Rau (for two years) have performed superbly in the work they have done on this project. This was also true of Sebastian Walther, who provided critical help and analysis of EU materials while he was studying at the University of Connecticut School of Law. Hillary Wasicek continued this tradition of excellent assistance for the last year and a half, including seeing the manuscript through to completion. Their help has made the project so much better, and without it the project would never have come to completion. The Library staff at the University of Connecticut School of Law, particularly Lee Sims and Louis Cruz on his research staff, has provided invaluable help both in key research as well as responding effectively and with good cheer to what must have seemed like an endless list of requests for materials from a wildly diverse array of sources. Patricia Carbray has performed her customary magic on the manuscript, flawlessly and with her usual good cheer, in the face of complicated and sometimes conflicting demands. I am deeply indebted to all these people. Of course, remaining errors are my own.
