We could not have completed this project without our colleagues at the International Technology Transfer Institute (ITTI), which is part of the Franklin Pierce Center for Intellectual Property at the University of New Hampshire School of Law. ITTI is working to develop expertise and services in international technology transfer that could hold the key for the developing world's future economic development. Our ITTI colleagues, in particular Dr. Stanley Kowalski, Professor Karen Hersey and Asst. Professor Jon Cavicchi, who is the best intellectual property librarian in the world, have generously given us their time to discuss the various ideas in the book, review drafts and give us their valuable insights on the broad range of topics this book addresses.

Other colleagues that have been with us from the outset, and supported us through the trials and tribulations of writing this book by providing their comments, insight and general good cheer, include Professors William Murphy, Susan Richey, Mary Wong and Bill Hennessey of the University of New Hampshire School of Law – Franklin Pierce Center for Intellectual Property. Asst. Professor Barry Shanks, also from UNH Law, provided us with his always valuable library research support. They are all friends in the fullest sense of the word.

This book draws heavily from Hong's 30+ years of experience in the Chinese legal system. Her interactions with classmates and professors from the Peking University Law School in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the students she taught for more than a decade as a law professor at the China University of Political Science and the Law, the Chinese judges she clerked for, the Chinese attorneys she has worked with, and the clients she has served have all shaped our research and analysis in this book. Hong would particularly like to thank Ms. Huang Ermei, the Grand Justice of the Supreme People's Court of the People's Republic of China, and Mr. Jason Lee, her partner with the Long An Law Firm and a former Justice of the Supreme People's Court, who shared with her their valuable experience on the changes that have been taking place in China's court system and the growing prominence of the law in China.

We also want to thank the very talented Chinese university technology transfer experts who spent time talking with us about their experiences in making technology commercialization a more meaningful part of Chinese economic development.

During our work on this book, we have had a number of talented research assistants who have provided us with thoughtful and generous assistance in writing and editing this book. They include Dr. Kimberly Peaslee, Nathan Greene, John Kenyon and Nathalia Pence.

Finally, and most importantly, our families provided immeasurable support while we wrote (and rewrote) the manuscript. We appreciate their patience and understanding as we disappeared for large periods of time to work on the book. John would like to thank his beautiful and almost perfect wife, Corinne, and his three children, Xavier, Alexandre and Morgane, for everything they give to him. John particularly wants to thank Morgane for always remembering to ask him how the book was going and telling him things would be okay after bad days – it meant a lot. Hong would like to thank her wonderful parents for all the love they have given to her throughout her life. Her great father Shen Dingyi and her late mother Xie Linfeng have always been her strongest supporters. Hong thinks her mother would have enjoyed reading this book.
