This book is based on my PhD thesis from the University of Essex, which was successfully defended in February 2008. Although it is impossible to make a complete list of people who have made contributions to this lengthy project, I would like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation, especially to the following people.

An enormous amount of gratitude goes to Professors Paul Hunt and Janet Dine, who were my PhD supervisors. Professor Hunt has inspired me immensely through our discussions and professional lectures. During and after my doctorate, he also gave me many opportunities to attend UN and other human rights meetings, which turned out to be valuable occasions for obtaining information and ideas that were essential for the research for this book. I thank Professor Dine for our weekly conversations, and for her encouragement, which assisted me greatly in keeping me motivated throughout the long and isolated journey of preparing a PhD thesis. During and after my doctorate, she continued to provide me with insights which deepened my understanding of my research. I thank her for her support and advice while I was turning my PhD thesis into a book.

I would also like to sincerely thank Professor Sigrun Skogly who, having examined my thesis, provided valuable comments in the process of turning it into a book. I also thank Dr. Mac Darrow for his encouragement for my research and publication of my thesis as a book.

I thank Professor Sheldon Leader who supervised my LLM at the University of Essex where I began researching International Financial Institutions (IFIs) and Human Rights. He encouraged me to continue to develop this theme for my doctorate, even though I originally intended to choose a different theme. I appreciate his insightful guidance. I also wish to thank Professor Ian Nearly for drawing my attention to “Japanese IFI” – Asian Development Bank (ADB).

I am very grateful to Professors Yozo Yokota and Kaoru Obata for their advice which deepened my understanding of the research and their encouragement to pursue my PhD in the UK. My work has also benefited from invaluable information and comments provided by Professor David Hunter, Dr. Margot Salomon, Dr. Sejal Parmar and Professor John Packer. My appreciation is extended also to Professors Sato Kan Hiroshi, Yoshiaki Nishikawa and Atsuko Ohashi for their assistance in deepening my understanding of issues of “participation”.

Finally, I would like to express my sincere gratitude to the late Professor Kevin Boyle. He served as a great advisor to my research both during and after my doctorate. Even a few weeks before his untimely death, I was privileged to discuss with him the information disclosure policies of IFIs, and I learned from his unlimited enthusiasm of human rights issues and was given warm encouragement to complete my book. I thank his family as well for their friendship and have many precious memories from those times in Essex. They even accommodated me for a few days while I finalised this book.

Most importantly, my appreciation goes to my family and friends in Japan. Both intellectually and emotionally, they have been a great support. Lastly, I wish to thank my colleagues at the University of Essex. Our stimulating discussions have always played an important part in my research.

I was privileged to have conversations and to conduct interviews to supplement my research based on primary and secondary literature. I was able to conduct interviews with Executive Directors and high level personnel of ADB in its annual meetings, consultations with civil society, and ADB’s headquarters office in Manila. In addition, I benefitted from fruitful communication with personnel of the World Bank (former and current), consultants and staff of ADB, and civil society organisations which monitor these banks. Some interviewees requested anonymity which has been respected.
