This book is the product of the collaboration between three authors, each of whom has some special thanks to give. The two academics, John Child and Suzana Rodrigues, owe a considerable debt to Kenneth Tse for the way in which he opened the doors of Yantian International Container Terminals, the focus of this book, to numerous research investigations. These included the projects conducted by 21 Master's students at the University of Birmingham for whom their stay at YICT was a learning experience of immense value. Without wishing to indulge in mutual self-praise, the long-term collaboration between academia and industry that has given rise to this book has proven to be of substantial benefit to both parties, but unfortunately happens far too rarely. The partnership both nurtured academic learning about management and supported YICT as a learning organization.

Kenneth's PhD research has made a significant input into this book. He would like to acknowledge how his academic colleagues – first as doctoral supervisors and now co-authors – insisted on 'evidence based' accounts and justified conclusions. Dr Leanne Chung helped the process of triangulation which confirmed the validity of Kenneth's interpretations of events, given his unusual dual role as both researcher of, and key actor in, the story. Ken Everett played the role of devil's advocate, questioning Kenneth at various points as he progressed with his thesis. Professor C.K. Mak read the entire thesis and has become a keen supporter of the co-evolutionary perspective embodied in this book. Kenneth's colleagues at YICT made the successful development of the port possible, which this book charts. To all of them, Kenneth owes a sincere debt of thanks.

All three of us wish to thank the managers and staff at YICT, those in Shenzhen's Yantian Port Group, and in various Chinese government agencies, who gave their valuable time to be interviewed and cited, as well as to share their views informally. There are far too many to mention by name here, but without them the YICT story would not have taken place, nor would it have been recorded here.

Suzana would also like to give particular thanks to the Dinalog Project Ultimate, the Erasmus SmartPort Community and Europe Container Terminal at Rotterdam for the opportunity to learn more about ports as organizations and how they operate. Participation in the Dinalog Project Ultimate not only provided valuable understanding for her contributions to this book, but also the financial support to conduct research in the port sector.

Above all, we owe a debt to our spouses. Karen Tse has always been there to support Kenneth during his long journey in pursuit of his doctorate and preparing materials for this book, with an encouraging word and smile. Anielo Rodrigues has never ceased to support Suzana in her duties far from home in Birmingham and then Rotterdam, which enabled her to contribute to the production of this book. Elizabeth Child likewise has tolerated the rivalry of the computer for John's attention as words turned into chapters. Without the encouragement and tolerance of our spouses, this book would not have been written and we dedicate it to them.
