
Acknowledgements

This book would not have been possible without the dedicated support of Dr Daniela di Piramo of Griffith University's Centre for Governance and Public Policy, who supported the editors with copy-editing, reference checking and endless other editorial coordination. Her professionalism and attention to detail were tireless, and the book is testimony to her careful eye as well as her dedication to the content.

We would also like to thank the editorial team at Edward Elgar for the invitation to compile the handbook, their patience and support through to completion.

We all also wish to thank our institutions for their support, and our family and friends who also understand, and help bear the burden, of the fact that whistleblowing research is much more than just a 'day job'.

Our greatest thanks go to our authors for agreeing to participate and providing such high-quality contributions to this vital field. We also wish to thank the broader membership of the International Whistleblowing Research Network for their very active participation in research and other debates in the brief years since the Network's establishment in 2009. Their involvement in conferences and correspondence has suggested many avenues for academic exploration, including many of the issues that have been raised and analyzed in this handbook.

Any active researchers with an interest in the highest quality interdisciplinary research into whistleblowing are welcome to join the Network by emailing its convenor, David Lewis at d.b.lewis@mdx.ac.uk.

A.J. BROWN
Griffith University

DAVID LEWIS
Middlesex University

RICHARD MOBERLY
University of Nebraska

WIM VANDEKERCKHOVE
University of Greenwich

