This first volume of the two-volume series was initially conceptualized by Stephen W. Gibson (founder of the Academy for Creating Enterprise) and Dr. Jeremi Brewer, Director of the Microenterprise Education Initiative (MEI) at Brigham Young University. However, this volume would not have been possible without the support and collaboration of Alan Sturmer (Edward Elgar Publishing) and Todd Manwaring (Director of Brigham Young University's Ballard Center for Economic Self-Reliance).

We are especially grateful to Matthew Taylor who has volunteered countless hours of work to make this book a reality. We also want to thank Jessica Pino for her dedication as a research assistant in the Ballard Center and for helping this book come to fruition. We would like to thank Dr. Marc Gruber and Dr. John Dencker for collaborating throughout this publication process and for hosting the 2013 Inaugural Necessity Entrepreneurship Conference. We must also thank Dr. Rebecca A. Brewer for her unwavering support and for being a source of wisdom and strength throughout the years. We would also like to thank Bette M. Gibson for her continued support and vision on the need for educating necessity entrepreneurs in developing nations.

Finally, we send our appreciation to each contributor of this volume for the time spent on preparing meaningful content that will surely shape the discourse of economic development throughout the world.
