

Acknowledgements

---

The research reported here could not have been conducted without the cooperation of judges, other public officials, lawyers and other representatives of corporations, NGOs and individual parties in the litigation that was investigated, most of whom preferred to remain anonymous. We gratefully acknowledge their willingness to give of their time and to share their knowledge, experience and perspectives.

The collaborative effort that produced this book was initiated by a series of international conferences on the globalization of class actions, co-sponsored by Stanford Law School and the Oxford Centre for Socio-Legal Studies, from 2007–2011. We gratefully acknowledge the support of all those who contributed to funding these conferences, especially the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences, Stanford Law School and the Oxford Centre for Socio-Legal Studies, which provided the lead grants for the 2007 conference, and Australian National University, Florida International University Law School and Tilburg University, which helped fund the subsequent international conferences. Deborah Hensler and Ianika Tzankova thank the Private Law Department of Tilburg University and the Royal Academy of Science of the Netherlands for supporting their collaborative research on the Dutch collective settlement procedure which initiated the empirical research program. The organization of the research team was facilitated by the American Law & Society Association's International Research Collaborative program. All of the authors gratefully acknowledge the support of their home institutions for their research and writing and for enabling the group to convene in various parts of the world to share their findings. The authors also thank Inge Pullens for her assistance editing the final manuscript.