Acknowledgements

A project such as this involves many moving parts and players. First and foremost, let us thank each of the contributing authors – Donald A. Brown, Trevor Daya-Winterbottom, Jan Glazewski, Bernard D. Goldstein, Pamela Ko, Bonita Kolb, Kenneth T. Kristl, John A. ‘Skip’ Laitner, James McElfish, Jill Morgan, John H. Quigley, Patricia Salkin, David B. Spence, Diana Staeres, John Ubinger, Jr., and Jonathan Williamson. The contributing authors to this book are its greatest strength. They are not only lawyers and current and former policy makers; they also represent public health, the social sciences, economics, and other disciplines. We are grateful for their chapters, thoughtful comments on chapters prepared by other contributing authors, and for patience along the way.

We are also grateful to Widener University School of Law for hosting the first national conference in the United States on the confluence of shale gas and sustainability, ‘Marcellus Shale Development and Pennsylvania: What Lessons for Sustainable Energy?’, held on 27 September 2013 at its campus in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. While this book has a broader focus than the conference – including not only Pennsylvania and elsewhere in the United States, but also other countries where shale gas development issues are emerging – many of the contributing authors were speakers at this conference. In addition, many ideas first expressed at the conference are further developed in this book.

Next, we had terrific assistance from Ms. Debbie Dantine, who helped with formatting, constructing the draft manuscript, and author biographies, and Jeremy Wingert, who also painstakingly helped with formatting and manuscript preparation. Holly Frey (Widener Law ’15) provided invaluable help with conforming syntax and citation style. Rich Sgrignoli (Widener Law ’15), Alex Sharpe (Widener Law ’16), and Austin Langan (Widener Law ’16) provided invaluable assistance with citation form.

And of course we thank our families for enduring what is hardly an inclusionary process for loved ones, including Kathy, Jameson, and Isabella (for Jimmy), and Kathy, Becky, and Tess (for John).

Last but not least, we are grateful to Edward Elgar Publishing for inviting us to arrange, write and assemble this book, including the encouragement and assistance of Stephen Gutierrez, Erin McVicar and Victoria Litherland who helped during the editorial process.

John C. Dernbach and James R. May