This book is concerned with the future of federalism in the twenty-first century and the varied ways in which the financial crisis of 2008–9 and its many legacies are shaping intergovernmental relations across a range of federal systems.

Given that federal systems are defined as much by their diversity as by their common features it is inevitable that a comparative project of this scope became a collaborative enterprise and we are deeply indebted to the 18 fiscal federalism experts who contributed their country-specific expertise to this project.

A research project with inputs from a group of international experts not only requires a good deal of cooperation by and commitment from contributors but also required the investment of significant financial and administrative resources. To this extent we would like to acknowledge the financial assistance of the Australian Research Council through a Discovery Project grant (DP1310281) as well as the support of the Institute for the Study of Social Change at the University of Tasmania and the Department of Business Law and Taxation at Monash University.

We would like to thank the staff of Monash University's Prato Campus for providing an idyllic setting for an initial workshop where contributors presented preliminary papers and refined themes for the final volume. We would also like to thank Hansjörg Blöchliger, Director of the OECD's Fiscal Federalism Network, for contributing to the Prato workshop.

Beyond the above-mentioned contributions of our colleagues we are deeply indebted to Peter Mellor and Helen Smith for their tireless and thorough research assistance and substantive contributions to this volume. We would also like to thank Robert Hortle for his work during the early stages of the project, before being awarded a well-deserved Rhodes Scholarship in late 2014.

Richard Eccleston would like to acknowledge the Australian-American Fulbright Commission for its support in late 2014 and Tim Conlan and Paul Posner from George Mason University for hosting his Fulbright Fellowship in autumn 2014. This Fulbright Fellowship provided an opportunity to develop and refine many of the themes in the book, to write some early draft chapters and to develop a first-hand appreciation of the complexity of American federalism.

Richard Krever would like to thank the School of Law at Seoul National University for its invitation to participate in the SNU Law Global Challenge Visiting Scholar programme. The programme offered an ideal environment for study, writing and editing contributions to this volume.

We would like to acknowledge the support and patience of Alex Pettifer and his team at Edward Elgar Publishing as well as the dozens of colleagues and practitioners the world over who contributed in big ways and small to this study.

Finally, Richard Eccleston would like to thank his family for their ongoing support and patience. Claire, Sam, Nick and Ben as well as extended family who provide so much support to allow us to balance raising three little boys and two academic careers.
