Acknowledgements

The idea for this book arose at one of the many privacy and data protection-related conferences in Europe, where the debate reflected several issues relating to privacy and data protection as fundamental rights but it did not encompass a discussion on the role of courts in shaping them. This book aims to fill this gap. However, our work could have not been completed without the help of many who either contributed actively to the preparation of the book or supported indirectly – but not less heartedly – our endeavours.

Therefore, we would like to thank all the contributors to this edited volume for their smooth collaboration and willingness to revise their chapters several times on the basis of our comments and suggestions as well as for their patience for what turned out to be a rather long editing process. Moreover, we would like to express our gratitude to Edward Elgar Publishing, notably Ben Booth, Iram Satti, Ellen Pearce, Sue Sharp and their colleagues who worked diligently for the publication of the book; Anjum Shabbir, who was entrusted with the language review of the entire manuscript, for her efficiency, enthusiasm and flexibility; Bruno de Witte for his participation in the workshop which preceded the publication of the book and for his encouragement throughout the manuscript’s preparation; and Ellen Vos. A warm word of gratitude goes of course to our families and friends for their unconditional support, love and understanding.

Maja Brkan and Evangelia Psychogiopoulou