This book extends our previous collaborative research to analyse the significance of the global financial crisis on the budgetary systems of a selection of Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) nations. It builds on two earlier volumes of work that have gained international recognition, namely, Controlling Public Expenditure, edited by John Wanna, Lotte Jensen and Jouke de Vries (Cheltenham, UK and Northampton, MA, USA: Edward Elgar Publishing, 2003); and The Reality of Budgetary Reform in OECD Nations: Trajectories and Consequences, again edited by John Wanna, Lotte Jensen and Jouke de Vries (Cheltenham, UK and Northampton, MA, USA: Edward Elgar Publishing, 2010). These two previous projects focused on the changing roles of central budget agencies in modernising budgetary processes and delivering outcomes; whilst the second also explored the reform trajectories followed by certain OECD countries in order to assess their effectiveness and contribution to overall fiscal sustainability. In this volume we examine the shocks to national budgetary systems posed by the global financial crisis to ask how well budgetary systems performed when faced with this enormous challenge to their sustainability.

We have benefited again from the support of a number of collaborative academic organizations and wish to acknowledge their assistance, including: the Department of Public Administration, The Hague Campus, Leiden University (the Netherlands); the College of Arts and Social Sciences at the Australian National University (Canberra, Australia); the Australia and New Zealand School of Government; and the Department of Management, Politics and Philosophy at Copenhagen Business School (Denmark). They all assisted in making this project possible and with administrative and financial support.

We wish to acknowledge the assistance of many finance and budgetary experts who assisted the project in each country, especially in Australia, Denmark, Ireland, Portugal, Sweden, the Netherlands, Spain and Greece. They were important in assisting with information, providing access, giving interviews and in some cases offering commentary and feedback. In many cases their commitment to such scholarly research meant that their involvement with this project was added to their already busy schedules. Some are specifically acknowledged in individual chapters.

A two-day workshop was held at Leiden University's Department of Public Administration located at their campus in The Hague to bring together academics and practitioners from the 12 OECD nations. The workshop explored how the global financial crisis had manifested itself in the various countries selected for investigation, and what responses governments had contemplated and implemented when faced with the crisis. The workshop was crucial to our collective understanding and overall assessments of the national and international responses. We would like to acknowledge the hospitality of the workshop host, Professor Jouke de Vries, and his department at The Hague Campus of Leiden University, especially for the magnificent venue and assistance with accommodation costs.

We wish particularly to thank David Tune, David Martine, Stein Helgeby, David Nicol and Arthur Camilleri (Australian Department of Finance), Ken Henry, David Gruen and Jim Murphy (Australian Treasury), Derek Gill (Victoria University Wellington), Andrew Podger (Australian National University), Paul 't Hart (Utrecht University), and Jon Blondall (OECD). Tom Degen, Benedicte Dobbinga, Shellaine Godbold, Claire Dixon, Sam Vincent, Justin Pritchard and Hsu-Ann Lee provided valuable administrative and research assistance to the project.

Sadly, one of our contributors Denise Fantone passed away suddenly before the publication of this book. Denise participated in each of our three books on budgeting and budgetary politics, and made a significant contribution to their quality. We offer our condolences to her family and friends.

Finally, we extend our appreciation to Edward Elgar and his staff for their support and encouragement of research endeavours in this field, in particular Laura Mann and Alan Sturmer.
