I would like to thank Matthew Pitman at Edward Elgar for originally suggesting the topic of the Geographies of Money and Finance for one of the publisher's Research Handbooks. Producing such a Research Handbook is really too much for one individual, and I was delighted when Jane Pollard accepted my invitation to join forces on the project. Her knowledge about the geographies of money, her attention to detail, and her constant good humour, have all been crucial to the completion of the book. I have enjoyed working with Jane immensely. Of course, compiling a Research Handbook such as this, always a lengthy task, depends critically on the cooperation and patience of the many contributors: our heartfelt thanks to them all for taking part in this project. My interest in the geographies of money and finance was first aroused in the late-1980s, and several cohorts of students attending my second year economic geography lectures at Cambridge endured my ramblings on the subject. Little did any of us know then just how profound and catastrophic an impact ever-increasing financialisation would come to have two decades later. I've always found academic life itself to be a rollercoaster, with its highs and lows. I have been fortunate, however, to have had the unswerving encouragement and confidence of my wife, Lynda: to her I dedicate this book.

I would like to thank everyone involved in the preparation of this book, our authors, Editor, Matthew Pitman, and all the production staff at Edward Elgar. Thanks to Ron Martin for asking me to edit this with him; many years and months later, we are – I am happy to report – still friends. I also owe a debt of gratitude to all the Undergraduate, Masters and PhD students who have taken and helped to teach my courses on money and have keenly debated questions around money and finance. To my colleagues at Newcastle in CURDS and the School of Geography, Politics and Sociology who have created such a congenial, good humoured and supportive environment, a big thank you. Neill Marshall most especially has been a friend and mentor and contributed so much to my and others' work on money and finance. Much of this volume took shape while I was a Visiting Professor in the Urban Planning Department at the Luskin School of Public Affairs at UCLA and in the Center for Place, Culture and Politics at CUNY. I would like to thank Evelyn Blumenberg, Brian Taylor, Ruth Wilson Gilmore, Mary Taylor and all the staff at UCLA and CUNY for making that possible. Special thanks to Diane and my extended family and friends for their support, you know who you are. Finally, I want to acknowledge my Dad who died during the production of this volume. He was a principled, fearless, compassionate man who made me laugh and taught me so much.

For Lynda, for her steadfast support and encouragement over many years.

For my parents, Lilian Pollard and John Brian Pollard, for their love, strength and support.
