1. The EU legislative process. An introduction from a political science perspective

Doreen Allerkamp

I. INTRODUCTION

The subject matter of this book falls into the realm of what political science describes as ‘judicial politics’, that is, the perpetual struggle between legislators’ intent and enforcers’ discretion to shape policy outcomes. While the ‘standard assumption’ about the ‘political role’ of the courts – that of a ‘separation of powers where courts adjudicate conflicts based on law being legitimated by the legislature’ – would not seem to attribute to them ‘greater political significance’,1 this assumption does not allow for the fact that all legislation is inevitably incomplete. It is from this circumstance that case law arises, ‘complementing the legal texts of the legislature’, and where the ‘independent impact’ of the interpreters and enforcers of legislation – in this case, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) – ‘becomes apparent’:2 they can, in filling the gaps, dispose of a certain amount of leeway, which for the CJEU is considerable and ‘much larger’ than for national courts.3 This, however, is only ‘part of the explanation’ for the Court’s ‘independent political role’: because legislatures are rarely ‘capable of acting unequivocally’ – and in particular that of the EU, which involves (at least) two independently strong institutions which must find a measure of agreement both

2 Ibid., 161.
within and between themselves in order to make EU law – a ‘legislative override’ of CJEU decisions is in most cases hard to come by.\(^4\)

Thus, the core dilemma underlying judicial politics is that between, on the one hand, the need for the rule of law and judicial independence in order to achieve effective law enforcement and, on the other hand, the inevitably resulting judicial discretion that effectively gives the judiciary a role in law-making rather than merely law-enforcement.\(^5\) Case law not only ‘guides the future behaviour of courts’, and therefore those subject to the law, but also law-makers, who operate in the shadow of the future: the framing and specification of legislation inevitably anticipates the fact that its interpretation and enforcement is guided by precedent.\(^6\)

To ask about the influence and discretion of the CJEU is to raise the question to what extent accumulating case law constrains EU policy-making, ‘given that judicial policy-making is a possible substitute to legislative policy-making’?\(^7\)

This chapter first briefly introduces the main institutions involved in making EU legislation and their major incentives and constraints (II.A), before outlining the EU’s main legislative procedure (II.B) with particular attention to the informal trilogue (II.C). The subsequent sections address the CJEU’s key role in EU polity-construction (III.A) before focusing on the discussion of its role in the context of EU policy-making (III.B), namely facilitating compliance with (III.B.1) but also shaping EU law (III.B.2), as well as the limits of CJEU discretion (III.B.3).

II. LAW-MAKING IN THE EU – ACTORS, INCENTIVES AND CONSTRAINTS

Political science can just about agree that the EU is a ‘polity’, i.e. a political system of some kind, somewhere between a state and an international organization. Although there have been a plethora of attempts to capture it more precisely, none of them has achieved a degree of consent that warrants the designation ‘broadly accepted’ – or been meaningful enough to be truly controversial. The EU is many things to many people. Moreover, it is not a static political system that has (been) completed (in) a process of teleological development and thus could easily be compared to other obvious examples of the species. Rather, it is

\(^4\) Schmidt (fn. 1) 161.
\(^5\) Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 78.
\(^6\) Schmidt (fn. 1) 161.
\(^7\) Ibid., 160.
constantly evolving, without any clearly definable finality. While many purposes and goals are and have over time been associated with the EU by a variety of stake-holders, its development – the process of European integration – has been a lot more evolutionary than predictable or even intentional. Similarly, while many individual aspects of the EU, such as the quality of its legitimacy, its institutions, its output or the processes by which it produces it, readily lend themselves to comparisons with others or assessment by pre-existing standards, the EU as a whole remains very much sui generis.

A. The EU’s Key Legislative Institutions – Incentives and Constraints

The EU’s legislative process is a particular case in point. Political responsibility for EU legislation is not borne by a government or some other consolidated authority; rather, it is distributed among several institutions, each legitimated in a different way and each with a distinct role to play in the making of EU law. Decisive in this context are the Council, the Parliament and the Commission, as well as – though it is conventionally defined as the core of the EU’s judiciary, not its legislature – the CJEU, which will be considered separately below. The interrelationships among the Council, the Commission and the Parliament are complex, and their incentives, constraints and relative influence over legislative outcomes are governed by the cumulative effect of a variety of formal and informal rules and norms. The latter two – supranational – institutions’ formal legislative influence has been growing, and while it still varies by policy area, in ‘most areas of regulatory policy-making’ they play a large role, because the majority of secondary EU law, including the 2014 Public Procurement Package, now falls under the ‘Ordinary Legislative Procedure’ (OLP), in which all three collaborate to 8 Indeed, the negotiations to avert ‘Brexit’ in early 2016 provided a clear demonstration of divergent preferences over the finality of European integration and the purpose of the EU.

---

9 On the CJEU, see section III. Both the Commission and the Council have, beyond their legislative roles, executive functions, which will not be considered here; in addition, the European Council of Member States’ heads of state and/or government, while it explicitly ‘shall not exercise legislative functions’ (Art. 15 TEU), can also affect legislative outcomes in various ways, most notably through its overall role in the political leadership of the EU.

create new legislation. Nevertheless, ‘most analysts would agree that the Council is the centre of power in the EU’, while the Commission has ‘considerable power particularly during the formative stages of the policymaking process’ and the Parliament ‘punches at least somewhat below the weight it is ascribed in the formal procedures’.

The Council is the main stronghold of ‘the most powerful actors in the EU system – the Member States’ governments.’ It is ‘still the prime legislative institution of the EU – no legislation is passed without the consent of the Council’, even if ‘it has had to get used to sharing legislative power’ with the Parliament ‘on most issues’. Both ‘intergovernmental and supranational in its procedures’, it is also ‘both national and European in its interests and incentives’. on the one hand, it is the forum for the representation of Member States’ diverse interests in the EU, where national envoys at all levels of the Council hierarchy – from bureaucrats in technical working groups through professional diplomats in the Committee of Permanent Representatives (COREPER) to government ministers in the Council (and heads of state in the European Council) – are pursuing national preferences in dealing with the EU’s agenda. On the other hand, the Council is the scene of the continuous negotiation of compromises among Member States, a process aided and abetted by the rotating Council Presidency, the Council Secretariat and a host of informal norms fostering agreement, since the Council’s role in EU law-making requires a unified Council position in order to engage with the other EU institutions. Thus, while the Member States’ incentive is to maximize their respective national preferences regarding the regulation of public procurement, they are restrained by the need to compromise in order to arrive at a common Council position. In turn, the Council’s overall incentive is to maintain the Member States’ prerogatives by defending its position, while it is restrained by the need to find agreement with the Parliament in order to produce legislation.

For its part, the Parliament brings together the elected representatives of the citizens of the EU and is the location of party-political, as opposed to international, clashes over issues on the EU’s agenda. However, the link between voters and their members of Parliament is ‘weak’, given 11 Cf. Art. 294 TFEU. The OLP currently applies in 85 Treaty-defined policy areas, i.e. most of the EU’s substantive areas of competence.

12 Thomson (fn. 10) 205.
14 Ibid., 136.
15 Ibid.
that the latter ‘face a dilemma’ in having to cater, on the one hand, to their national parties ‘to secure re-selection and re-election’ and, on the other hand, to their political group leaderships and committees in the Parliament ‘to secure promotion … and policy outputs’ there.\textsuperscript{16} While the parliamentarians therefore normally ‘try to avoid upsetting their political group leaderships’, if they are ‘ever torn between their national party and their European political group, they almost always vote with their national party’, but also ‘more along transnational party lines than national lines’.\textsuperscript{17} Because there is no EU government relying on steady majority support in the Parliament, it is ‘a relatively independent legislation, free to amend legislation proposed by the Commission and agreed by the Council, and the Commission and the Council must build coalitions in the Parliament issue by issue’.\textsuperscript{18} Consequently, on ‘many’ issues the Parliament ‘behaves as if it were a single actor seeking to promote its own powers and interests’ against those of the other two legislative institutions.\textsuperscript{19} The rules of the legislative process enable ‘an informal “grand coalition”’ between the two largest factions,\textsuperscript{20} which ‘secures the pro-integrationist stand’ the Parliament takes in these ‘inter-institutional battles’, while the internal ‘day-to-day ideological battle between left and right’ mirrors that of most national parliaments: ‘In sum, the leaders of the main political groups balance the need to present a united front against the Council and the Commission and the need to present competing ideological alternatives for the future of the EU.’\textsuperscript{21} Thus, just like the Council and, to a lesser extent, the Commission, the Parliament faces an internal balancing act. But two aspects weaken the relative strength of the Parliament vis-à-vis the Council. First, while its

\textsuperscript{16} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 54–5.
\textsuperscript{17} Ibid., 57 and 60. Cf, inter alia, A Kreppel, ‘What Affects the European Parliament’s Legislative Influence? An Analysis of the Success of EP Amend-
\textsuperscript{18} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 54.
\textsuperscript{19} Ibid., 59.
\textsuperscript{20} While a simple majority of those present suffices to win a vote on opinions, own initiative reports and amendments to resolutions on legislation, an absolute majority of all members of Parliament is required for amendments in OLP second reading (cf section II.B). Thus, coalition formation is ‘at least partly shaped’ by which majority is needed: the two largest groups, currently the Christian Democrats (EPP) and the Social Democrats (S&D), are able to form winning coalitions ‘with various combinations of smaller groups’ for a simple majority, but for an absolute majority, it is ‘almost impossible’ to do so without both of them. Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 59–60.
\textsuperscript{21} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 60.
powers have been ‘gradually extended over the past decades’ in successive Treaty reforms cumulating in the normalization of co-decision in the OLP by the Lisbon Treaty, it is still ‘excluded from legislative co-decision’ in wide policy areas including welfare, taxation, and foreign policy.\textsuperscript{22} Second, the requirement of an absolute majority to amend or reject a bill in second reading puts the Parliament ‘at a disadvantage’, because it makes it ‘easier’ for it ‘to accept the common position of the Council than to reject or amend it’.\textsuperscript{23} Thus, a comparison of different procedural (focusing on formal rules) and bargaining (including informal rules) models of EU decision-making shows that the Parliament’s ‘actual ability to affect legislation’ is less than expected, and the notion of it as ‘co-equal legislator’ under the OLP must be ‘qualified’.\textsuperscript{24}

As the third main player in EU law-making, the Commission is tasked with representing the interest of the Union, and its formal role consists mainly of its monopoly on legislative proposals and the subsequent implementation and monitoring of the resulting EU legislation. It also contributes to the formation of both the Council’s and the Parliament’s respective positions, and plays a role in the negotiation of legislation between them. Because ‘[i]t institutional position in the EU’s political system demands the Commission … come up with an EU-wide binding policy-proposal’,\textsuperscript{25} it can be argued that it has ‘a strategic incentive’ to avoid its proposals failing, to the extent that it ‘will refrain from tabling a proposal in the first place if it does not anticipate that it will gain enough support’ from the other two legislative institutions.\textsuperscript{26} Moreover, it can be ‘compelled’ by the Member States or the Parliament to introduce \textsuperscript{22} B Rittberger and T Winzen, ‘The EU’s Multilevel Parliamentary System’, in J Richardson and S Mazey (eds) (fn. 1) 107, 110.

\textsuperscript{23} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 69. Cf S Hagemann and B Høyland, ‘Bicameral Politics in the European Union’ (2010) 48(4) Journal of Common Market Studies 811. They also found that in the bicameral bargaining between Council and Parliament, each chamber’s cohesiveness made a difference, as the Parliament is less likely to find the absolute majority required in second reading to amend the common position of a divided Council than that of a unified Council, which points to ‘a close connection between the political parties represented across the institutions’, Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 73.
\textsuperscript{25} A Wonka, ‘The European Commission’, in J Richardson and S Mazey (eds) (fn. 1) 83, 100.
\textsuperscript{26} Naurin (fn. 13) 145 and 153.
proposals, and thus, while it is formally an agenda-setter in the context of the EU legislative process, it is not a gatekeeper, since it is unable to keep items off the agenda.\footnote{27}{Thomson (fn. 10) 201; \textit{cf} A Rasmussen, ‘Challenging the Commission’s Right of Initiative? Conditions for Institutional Change and Stability’ (2007) 30(2) \textit{West European Politics} 244; C Crombez, T Groseclose and K Krehbiel, ‘Gatekeeping’ (2006) 68(2) \textit{Journal of Politics} 322.} Although it is thus constrained in the making of substantive policy proposals, the Commission ‘quite regularly’\footnote{28}{Wonka (fn. 25) 100.} clashes with the Member States and also with the Parliament in making EU legislation, not least because their heterogeneity of preferences limits its ability to anticipate the eventual compromise position. In addition, other incentives are also seen as affecting its position, notably an ‘entrepreneurial striving for more European integration and harmonization’ in pursuit of an institutional interest to expand its competencies, budget and overall power in decision-making, similar to bureaucracies at the national level.\footnote{29}{Wonka (fn. 25) 99. \textit{Cf}, inter alia, B Hörl, A Warntjen and A Wonka, ‘Built on Quicksand? A Decade of Procedural Spatial Models on EU Legislative Decision-Making’ (2005) 12(3) \textit{Journal of European Public Policy} 592–606.} Yet this ‘invariant preference for more integration’\footnote{30}{Ibid., 100.} is unlikely to affect all policy areas to the same extent. More pertinent and more specifically predictive of the Commission’s position on a topic such as the re-regulation of public procurement is the fact that, like the other main legislative EU institutions, the Commission – contrary to appearances – is not a unitary actor: power rivalries and diverging preferences among Commission Directorates General over ‘appropriate regulatory goals’ and the ‘relative distribution of political and economic costs and benefits’ can shape policy proposals, as can the responsible Commissioner’s nationality.\footnote{31}{Ibid., 100.}

B. Making EU Law – The Ordinary Legislative Procedure (OLP)

The decisive feature of the OLP is that it formally puts the Parliament on an equal footing with the previously solely dominant Council in passing bills. First, the Commission drafts a legislative proposal – on its own initiative, at the request of other EU institutions\footnote{32}{The OLP may be launched at the request of the CJEU for a few, very specific purposes, such as establishing specialized courts attached to the General Court to hear at first instance particular types of proceedings in certain areas, as well as in line with Art. 13 of the CJEU Statute.} or Member States, or because of a citizens’ initiative, and normally following various forms of extensive internal and external consultation. The OLP formally begins when the proposed text is then forwarded simultaneously to the Parliament, Council and the national parliaments of the Member States as well as, in certain cases including the reform of public procurement, to the Committee of the Regions (CoR) and the European Economic and Social Committee (EESC) for comment.

What follows are the first readings in the Parliament and the Council. In the case of the Parliament, its President forwards the proposal to the competent parliamentary committee (which in turn appoints a rapporteur) for the drafting of a report with potential amendments, on which it then votes. On this basis, the parliamentary plenary subsequently debates and votes on the legislative proposal under consideration; it may accept the proposal unchanged or amended (or ask the Commission to withdraw it): the result is its official first reading position, which is forwarded to the Council. The Council, meanwhile, has been undertaking its preparatory work, and its own first reading then happens based on the Parliament’s finalized first reading position. If the Council accepts the Parliament’s first reading position, the legislative act is adopted; if it elects to amend it, the Council’s own first reading position is sent back to the Parliament for a second reading.

If either of the two main legislative institutions accepts the other’s first reading position, the OLP can be concluded at this stage. If not, the Parliament is given three–four months to consider the Council’s first reading position – again first in Committee for the preparation of a recommendation for the Parliament’s second reading, upon which the plenary then votes, including on possible (limited) amendments. The legislative proposal is adopted in the Council’s first reading version if the Parliament either approves it or fails to decide by the deadline; if the Parliament votes to reject it, the legislative proposal is not adopted and the procedure is closed.

If the Parliament adopts amendments to the Council’s first reading position, this results in the Parliament’s second reading position, which is forwarded to the Council for its second reading, for which there is also a three–four-month time limit. The proposed legislative act is adopted if the Council approves all parliamentary amendments in second reading. If 33 See contribution by Aspey to this book.

---

34 Under Protocols No 1 (role of national parliaments) and No 2 (principles of subsidiarity and proportionality) to the TEU, the Member State parliaments are (currently) given eight weeks to form a ‘reasoned opinion’ on whether the proposed draft legislation violates the subsidiarity principle.
not, the Presidents of both institutions must, within six–eight weeks, jointly convene the Conciliation Committee, constituted by equal numbers of members of the Parliament and Council representatives. This Committee is given another six–eight weeks to agree on a joint text based on the Parliament’s and the Council’s second reading positions to be forwarded to both for a third reading; otherwise, the proposed legislative act is rejected and the OLP ends. In third reading, also limited to six–eight weeks, the co-legislators may decide in any order but may not change the proposed text. If both approve it in time, the legislative act is adopted; if not, it is rejected and the OLP is irrevocably concluded.

C. Making EU Law – The Informal Trilogue

Given the complexity and duration of this process, it is perhaps not surprising that early agreements (after first reading) have constituted a growing trend. In the case of the 2014 Public Procurement Package, too, the OLP was concluded early when the Council accepted the Parliament’s position at first reading on February 11, 2014.35 Although there is no formal record of informal contacts, the speed with which the procedure was completed (barely a month after the Parliament had issued its first reading position) suggests that both institutions have availed themselves extensively of the informal practice of the inter-institutional trilogue with a view to facilitating the timely conclusion of the legislative process. In pursuit of a first reading agreement, the co-legislators often resort to such informal inter-institutional meetings, normally including the pertinent Parliament rapporteur, the Council Presidency representative in charge of the relevant working party and/or the permanent representative chairing COREPER, and Commission representatives from the responsible department as well as its Secretariat-General. The goal of these meetings, which have strongly increased over the last years,36 is to ensure that the Parliament’s first reading position will be acceptable to the Council, with the Commission mediating and editing compromise texts. However, criticism has been levelled against the trilogues for their informality, lack of transparency, and potential for ‘unwanted power redistributions within the institutions,37 to the advantage of the ‘relais’

35 CS-PRES/2014/6328.
36 Naurin (fn. 13) 142.
actors’ who represent them in those meetings and thus gain access to privileged information on the positions involved in the on-going legislative procedure. However, while there is some support for the notion of strengthened parliamentary rapporteurs, ‘so far no such evidence exists for the Council’.

III. THE ROLE OF THE CJEU IN EU LAW-MAKING

A. The CJEU and the Construction of the EU Legal System

While the EU cannot be considered a state, and does not have a constitution, it does have a set of founding treaties, which the CJEU has described as a ‘constitutional charter’. Moreover, it has been undergoing what has been termed a process of ‘gradual constitutionalization’, in particular of its legal system. The CJEU has been playing a key role in this process, helped by the fact that all EU Member States are by definition subject to the rule of law and their citizens accustomed to the idea of judicial hierarchy and a Court of last resort, which has increased acceptance of its decisions. Thus, the Court has been – and to the extent that the EU is permanently under construction, in the sense that adding to the acquis communautaire means continuing to build the system, (potentially) continues to be – instrumental in creating the very system that produces EU law, laying the foundations for its own influence on that system’s output in the process. Most notably, in this context, it has established the quasi-federal doctrines of the direct effect and supremacy of EU law.

41 Lex Verts v Parliament, C-294/83, EU:C:1986:166, cf Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 83.

The direct effect of EU law, meaning EU citizens derive rights from it which must be upheld by national courts, was first established in a landmark ruling in 1963, against the resistance of the majority of Member States at the time. In it, the CJEU defined the EU as ‘a new legal order’ whose subjects were both the Member States and their citizens. Initially attributed to primary EU law (Treaty articles) only, the Court subsequently extended the doctrine of direct effect to all secondary EU legislation.

45 Cf Stein (fn. 42), Schmidt (fn. 1) 169.
Similarly, having asserted the supremacy of EU law in yet another landmark decision, the CJEU ‘confirmed and reinforced [it] in subsequent rulings’, extending it to all forms of EU law. The linked federal principle of pre-emption, requiring lower political levels to cede their regulatory competence ‘once an issue has been regulated at the higher level’, has been ‘much slower to develop’ in the EU, counteracted not least by the principle of subsidiarity. However, the Court, having gradually developed a power to police the vertical allocation of competences between the EU and its Member States, has been granted exclusive Kompetenz-Kompetenz by the Lisbon Treaty, which contains, for the first time, an explicit catalogue of competence distributions, which the CJEU now has ‘the sole right to police’; competences exclusive to the EU (Article 3 TFEU), shared between the EU and the Member States (Article 4 TFEU), areas where economic and social policies are to be coordinated (Article 5 TFEU), and areas where EU action may supplement that by Member States (Article 6 TFEU).

B. The Role of the CJEU in EU Policy-Making

Apart from its role in building the system, the CJEU plays an important part in shaping and implementing its legislative output. It does this in two main ways: one passive – enabling compliance with EU law, and one active – shaping EU law.

1. Enabling compliance with EU law

EU law takes three main forms. First, there are the primary acts negotiated among the EU Member States, i.e. the founding and successive reforming Treaties establishing and reforming the Union. Second, deriving from the Treaties, there are five types of secondary acts by the EU’s legislative and executive institutions, i.e. the Council, the Parliament and the Commission; the most important of these are regulations

---

46 Costa v ENEL, C-6/64, EU:C:1964:66; cf Schmidt (fn. 1) 169.
47 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 85.
50 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 88–9.
51 Ibid., 89.
52 Ibid., 78–9.
and directives. The distinction between them is no longer as clear-cut as may have originally been intended because directives often extend to a level of detail that does not allow for much leeway in transposition into national law. Moreover, both have direct effect, which is:

fundamentally important as it makes it more difficult for Member States to simply opt against compliance with non-implementation. Whereas before, Member States could only be targeted if the Commission initiated infringement procedures, with direct effect of directives, litigants can enforce their rights at their domestic courts, using ‘fire alarm control’ of insufficient implementation.

However, especially given the cases at hand in this book, it is important to note that there is a difference in the application of direct effect to regulations and directives. Having established the principle of horizontal, as opposed to just vertical, direct effect, the CJEU conferred both on regulations, while directives, due to the need for transposition, thus far have only vertical direct effect. Since affirming the direct effect of 53 Regulations are of general application, binding on the EU and all Member States, while directives are applicable to any or all Member States, binding in terms of the intended policy ends but not the means (i.e., to be transposed into national law). The remaining three types of secondary acts are decisions (applicable to Member States, EU citizens or legal entities, binding on addressees), recommendations (applicable to any or all Member States or EU citizens, not binding) and opinions (applicable to any or all Member States or EU citizens, not binding).

---

56 Cf Walrave and Koch v Association Union Cycliste Internationale and Others, C-36/74, EU:C:1974:140; Defrenne v SABENA, C-43/75, EU:C:1976:56.

57 Cf Marshall v Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority, C-152/84, EU:C:1986:84; Faccini Dori v Recreb, C-91/92, EU:C:1994:292. In any case, directives do have ‘anticipatory direct effect’, which prevents Member States taking any legislative action that counteracts a directives in 1974, the CJEU has ‘consistently denied’ their horizontal direct effect; otherwise, the direct effect of all EU law is established ‘as long as the criteria for direct effect are met: rules need to be clear and unambiguous; unconditional; and not requiring further action’. Arguably, this is more due to the political sensitivity of certain policy areas for Member States than any constitutional principle precluding it, as subsequently, to ‘compensate for the lack of a horizontal direct effect of directives’, the CJEU established the ‘doctrine of “state liability”’, which the Member States had ‘explicitly refused to grant’ shortly before, and which ‘implies that the state is liable for all infringements of EU directives’.

Moreover, in the face of continued strong member state opposition, the Court further elucidated the principle in a series of cases in 1996 (Brasserie du Pêcheur, Factortame III, British Telecommunications, Hedley Lomas, Dillenkofer). Following this, conditions are that the European law has to confer rights on individuals, the breach must be sufficiently serious, and there must be a causal link between the failure to comply and the loss suffered. The principle is relevant for all violations of European law, not only the non-transposition of directives but also irrespective of whether the law has direct effect.

The third form of EU law are informal ‘general principles of law … derived from the EU’s basic principles’ as expressed in primary law such as the preambles to the Treaties, or in the constitutions of the Member States. Four ‘main types’ of such ‘general principles of law’ can be distinguished:

- ‘principles of administrative and legislative legality’, including legal certainty, proportionality and procedural fairness;
- ‘economic freedoms’, including the freedom of movement for goods, services, capital and persons as well as the freedoms of trade and competition; EU public procurement law has been considered as ‘supplementing’ these fundamental freedoms, which ‘practically oblige Member States to create the Single Market via their sovereign responsibilities of public administration’;
- ‘fundamental human rights’ as elaborated in the EU’s Charter of Fundamental Rights;
- ‘political rights’ as declared by Member States and mentioned in the EU Treaty, including transparency and subsidiarity.

The CJEU is tasked by Article 19(1) TEU to ‘ensure that in the interpretation and application of the Treaties the law is observed’. More specifically, the EU Treaty defines three main areas of CJEU jurisdiction for the purpose of fostering compliance with EU Law: infringement proceedings, judicial review and the preliminary references procedure.

First, infringement proceedings may be brought against any EU Member State(s) for noncompliance with any part of the acquis communautaire by the Commission or by another Member State. The Treaty

---

62 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 79, emphasis added.
63 Ibid., 79.
64 W Hakenberg, Europarecht (7th edn, Vahlen 2015) 119–20; author’s translation.
65 Cf Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 82–3. The Court’s jurisdiction also includes the more minor matters of suits for damages brought by Member States or private individuals against EU institutions (Art. 268 TFEU), European Council acts related to a member state’s breach of fundamental rights (Art. 269 TFEU), and employment disputes between the EU and its staff (Art. 270 TFEU).
66 Art. 258 TFEU.
67 Art. 259 TFEU.
explicitly makes compliance with the consequent CJEU ruling compulsory, and since the Treaty of Maastricht, this article empowers the Court to impose financial sanctions for non-compliance.

Secondly, similar to constitutional courts at the national level, the CJEU has the power of judicial review of legislative and executive acts at the EU level, including those by the European Council and the European Central Bank (ECB). Pertinent actions can be brought by any Member State, the Council, the Parliament or the Commission on the grounds of ‘lack of competence’ or a violation of Treaty or procedural requirements; by the ECB, the Court of Auditors or the Committee of the Regions ‘to protect their own prerogatives’; by private citizens against an EU institution’s decision of ‘direct concern’ to them; or by ‘any natural or legal person’ against an EU institution for failure to act despite having been tasked to do so under the acquis. In this context, ‘[p]recise rules, granting clear legal rights, favour … “Eurolegalism”, a variant of the adversarial legalism prominent in the US regulatory approach, as litigants find it then easier to push for implementation in their domestic courts’ – a type of ‘fire alarm control’ by private interests the Commission relies upon, and both the CJEU and the Parliament have pushed for, to foster compliance. Article 263 TFEU is particularly relevant in the area of public procurement carried out directly by EU institutions, and mainly the Commission: even if such procurement is not subject to the 2014 Public Procurement Package, the interpretation of the general procurement rules is influential for the CJEU’s assessment of EU institutions’ compliance with the applicable financial rules. Thus, in the area of public procurement, direct challenges of procurement decisions by EU institutions develop a function similar to that of preliminary references in challenges before Member States’ domestic courts.

68 Art. 260 TFEU.
69 The post-Maastricht Art. 260 TEU allowed the Commission, ‘in cases of perpetuated non-compliance to turn to the Court suggesting the payment of a lump sum or of a penalty’, Schmidt (fn. 1) 171, provisions which were subsequently further strengthened both by the Court through case law and by the Member States in the Treaty of Lisbon (TFEU Art. 260(2) and (3)), cf. Schmidt (fn. 1) 171–2.
70 Art. 263 TFEU.
71 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 82.
72 Art. 265 TFEU.
Third, under the preliminary references procedure, any national court may refer cases relating to any aspect of EU law to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling, while the highest national courts (those against whose decisions there is no appeal) must do so. While there is some national variation in terms of their incentives to do so, this option is generally attractive to national courts because basing their rulings on supreme EU law can help to protect them against being overturned in the national judicial hierarchy.

While national courts then have ‘some discretion’ in applying the CJEU’s preliminary rulings in their own judgments, those preliminary CJEU interpretations of EU law often allow little leeway. Thus, rather than leaving the final ruling on such cases to national courts, as the procedure – and in particular its designation as ‘preliminary’ – might suggest, it not only ‘reveals a high penetration of EU law into the national legal systems’, but, ‘by enabling national courts to enforce … [CJEU] judgments’, effectively turns them into ‘the lower tier of an integrated EU court system, and the … [CJEU into] the quasi-supreme court at its pinnacle.’ This means Member States cannot ignore EU law

---

74 Art. 267 TFEU.
77 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 82–3.
78 Ibid., 83. Not all national courts of the Member States would consent to being considered ‘lower’ in the EU’s judicial hierarchy, however (cf W Mattli and A-M Slaughter, ‘Revisiting the European Court of Justice’ (1998) 52(01) International Organization 177). In particular, a constitutional court like the German Bundesverfassungsgericht, quite used to having the final say, has in the past insisted on its ‘highest Court’ status by inserting a proviso of future constitutionality (particularly with respect to human rights and national identity) into rulings upholding EU law and CJEU judgments and by reserving the right to declare acts of EU organs ultra vires (e.g. in the German Court’s Brunner decision on the Maastricht Treaty, or its 2009 Lisbon ruling), cf. Alter (2006, fn. 76), Hix and Høyland (fn. 3), JH Weiler, ‘Does Europe Need a Constitution? Demos, Telos and the German Maastricht Decision’ (1995) 1(3) European Law without destabilizing their domestic judicial systems.\textsuperscript{79} Thus, given that rulings under the preliminary references procedure now constitute ‘the majority’ of CJEU judgments, its jurisdiction under Article 267 TFEU has proved ‘far more significant for the development of EU law and the constitutionalization of the EU system’ than that in any other domain of law.\textsuperscript{80}

In sum, the CJEU plays ‘the traditional role of courts in policy-making, a passive, enabling role, fostering compliance’ and thus strengthening the rule of law and the actors’ confidence ‘that agreements are kept and policies implemented, despite incentives to defect’\textsuperscript{81} The CJEU acts, in other words, as the final guarantor of credible – and, for secondary legislation, ‘unprecedented’\textsuperscript{82} – commitment, tying both Member States and the representatives of the European public to their own ideals as expressed, not least, in the preambles of successive Treaties. The EU’s overall compliance record demonstrates the CJEU’s effectiveness in this regard,\textsuperscript{83} due not least to the somewhat ‘unexpected development of judicial enforcement’, bolstered by the expansion of direct effect and ‘the broad indirect access’ allowed by the preliminary references procedure, as both it and the infringement procedure ‘acquired more teeth’ over time.\textsuperscript{84}

\textbf{Journal} 219; Schmidt (fn. 1) 164/165. Similarly, the highest national courts in the UK and France have maintained that the acceptance of the supremacy and direct effect of EU law ‘is conditional on national constitutional norms: for example that parliaments retain the right to revoke the supremacy of EU law by withdrawing the transfer of sovereignty to the EU’, Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 95, something that the House of Commons has reaffirmed intermittently.

\textsuperscript{79} Cf. Schmidt (fn. 1) 164.

\textsuperscript{80} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 82–3; cf. the Annual Reports of the CJEU, Schmidt (fn. 1) 163.

\textsuperscript{81} Schmidt (fn. 1) 170.

\textsuperscript{82} Ibid., 160.

\textsuperscript{83} Cf. Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 100; M Zürn and D Wolf, ‘Europarecht und Internationale Regime: Zu den Merkmalen von Recht Jenseits des Nationalstaates’, in E Grande and M Jachtenfuchs (eds), \textit{Wie Problemlösungsfähig ist die EU? Regieren im europäischen Mehrebenensystem} (Nomos 2000) 113. This with the obvious, major proviso that the Court and all other EU institutions continue to rely almost entirely on the Member States’ national resources for law enforcement.

\textsuperscript{84} Schmidt (fn. 1) 170.
Shaping EU law

The relative dearth of analyses of the precise impact of case law on EU legislative decision-making, or of how EU Member States and legislative institutions have dealt with the fact that case law, as ‘an alternative to secondary law’ constrains legislative options, means that the CJEU’s weight in EU policy-making is ‘both well recognized and misconceived’.

Political science does offer a range of models to explain ‘the strategic interaction between legislators and judges’, more broadly, and the ‘central result’ of the work on courts is that they are ‘powerful and essentially weak actors at the same time’. The CJEU displays the reasons for this very well: its power results from its potential role as a veto player in the policy process and its entrenched ‘constitutional’ position; its weakness from its relative passivity, its dependence on being called upon to rule in the first place (i.e., being brought cases) by other players in the policy process, as well as on those other players’ subsequent compliance with its rulings.

After early work from what has been described as a ‘legal-formalist’ perspective saw the CJEU mainly as ‘a heroic promoter of European integration against the wishes of the Member States’, two main competing approaches have established themselves.

2.1 The intergovernmentalist perspective and the importance of Member State preferences

The intergovernmentalist school of European integration sees the CJEU merely as an ‘agent’ of the EU Member States, ‘empowered to enforce integration’ on their behalf but reined in by the judges’ status as ‘national delegates’ and by the twin threats of noncompliance and sanctions if it exceeds its mandate. However, Member

85 Ibid., 174.
86 Ibid., 160.
87 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 75–6.
88 Schmidt (fn. 1) 160.
89 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 95–6; cf Weiler (fn. 76).
States’ possibilities for both noncompliance (as discussed in part III.B.1 above) and sanctions (see point III.B.3.4 below) are quite limited. What is more, the empirical answer to the key question of how much the CJEU’s judgments reflect (in particular: large) Member States’ preferences appears to be: not very much, as the evidence suggests that the CJEU has ‘often’ ruled against their submitted opinions, observations or stated policies:92

It is not uncommon for the Court to interpret secondary law in the light of [T]reaty provisions, thereby coming to interpretations that deviate from the express meaning of the legislation, or to read precise obligations out of the [T]reaty, so that Member States have to enact steps also when there is no agreement on secondary law … The fact that case law often merely works to favour one legislative actor over another may be taken to deny its independent relevance … However, it has to be recognized that there would not have been a political agreement on this precise judicial interpretation, which favours one interpretation at the costs of others.93

In order to square this with a view of the CJEU as a compliant agent of powerful Member State principals, it would be necessary to accept the judges’ majority view as an ‘imperfect proxy’ for the majority view of the Member States who appointed them.94 In addition, claims about the direct or indirect (via the selection of judges, see point III.B.3.2 below) impact of Member State preferences at least implicitly – and wrongly –

93 Schmidt (fn. 1) 162.

assume a perfect malleability of law, which judges can interpret according to political need’.95

2.2 The supranationalist perspective and the importance of case law

The supranationalist school of European integration, by contrast, points out that as more and more different actors gain access to the EU policy process in a variety of ways, ‘leading to shifting coalitions’, Member States have lost their position as ‘gatekeepers, channelling input into the supranational system’.96 In this view, the CJEU is an independent-minded policy entrepreneur capable of working with ‘self-interested lower national courts, integrationist judges, and private interests to move EU integration beyond the intentions of the governments’.97 In this, the Commission is an ‘important ally’ of the CJEU: its ability to initiate cases means it is ‘well poised to strategically influence the development of case law’, and it ‘normally’ contributes observations to all cases where it is not party to the proceedings; in fact, its ‘policy position is a good predictor of the case outcome as it is normally on the winning side’.98

Thus, in the EU, ‘to an extent more known from the US than from European countries, litigation has … become an alternative to lobbying as legal changes can be realized via case law or via secondary law’.99 Because secondary EU law ‘is often equivocal and loosely worded’,100 quite deliberately allowing different interpretations of what compliance would require from the perspective of Member States, the CJEU has been seeking definite readings:

Even where a directive is ambiguously formulated, the Court will not take the view that what one might call different interpretations may coexist. Instead the Court will determine the one and only correct interpretation, leaving little or no discretion to the national legislature. … [T]his non-deferential approach 95 Schmidt (fn. 1) 166. Given the intransparency of the CJEU’s votes and the absence of dissenting opinions, an empirical analysis of this question remains impossible, however.

96 Schmidt (fn. 1) 166.
97 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 95, cf 98–100, Alter (fn. 90).
98 Schmidt (fn. 1) 166, Cichowski (fn. 92) 499.
100 Schmidt (fn. 1) 170.
puts a considerable burden on the Court, and may indeed lead it to fill in significant gaps in the text of the [Union] legislation which … is often the result of compromise and may therefore be unclear on crucial policy issues.101

In this way, case law becomes ‘an alternative to secondary law’, and – whether ‘existing or pending’ – must be taken into account in the analysis of EU decision-making alongside the preferences of the Member States and the legislative institutions, ‘as the default condition of decision-making is shaped judicially’.102

3. Limiting the CJEU’s influence?
The question arises what, if any, limits are there to the discretion and influence of the CJEU? Pertinent in this context is work straddling the boundaries between political science and law that has identified a series of factors affecting the extent of a court’s discretion, most of them applicable to the CJEU.

3.1 Repeals and circumventions First, there is the possibility of active resistance to CJEU decisions and the question of the probability of new legislation repealing or effectively circumventing CJEU decisions. Some scholars consider the probability of repeals to be low103 due to the involvement of veto-players able to prevent such changes.104 Given that law normally represents ‘compromises among political actors’ who ‘may interpret these compromises differently’; and because the Court’s interpretation ‘is likely to favour one party over the other’, it may be ‘difficult to muster the necessary majority to intervene against the case law’.105 This is especially likely in ‘separation-of-powers systems’ like the EU, where, furthermore, ‘legislation must be adopted by oversized and

105 Schmidt (fn. 1) 161.
multiple legislative majorities’, so that the CJEU can ‘reasonably assume that at least one veto-player will prefer the court’s interpretation to the original legislative intention, and hence block a repeal of the court’s decision’.106

On the other hand, while the EU legislative can thus be seen as operating in ‘the shadow of case law’,107 it makes ‘a great difference’ whether the case law in question relates to primary or secondary EU law, given that the latter is easier to adjust and hence ‘less of a constraint’. Between the two extremes of either having no influence or replacing legislation (‘in the sense of making it superfluous or overruling it’), case law may ‘motivate legislation’ in two different ways:108 Member States may seek to codify it to make it ‘more accessible’ for market participants and to further legal certainty and equality before the law; or they may seek to ‘pre-empt it’ by passing legislation that represents a ‘lesser evil’.109 While perhaps not a priority for Member States, or even unwanted, such legislation may help them retain regulatory control when confronted with emerging case law the thrust of which they disagree with. A third way for Member States to resist unwanted case law, provided the necessary majorities are available, is to adopt secondary legislation that deviates from the case law in question openly (as in the case of public procurement, as further discussed in several of the contributions to this book and in the conclusions), or to circumvent such case law by nominally consolidating or codifying it in new legislation which effectively restricts it.110

3.2 Disunity and uncertainty Second, there is the question of legislators’ awareness of the Court’s preferences – and the related issue of whether any assessment of the CJEU’s role in the context of EU decision-making, or of its likely decisions, can justifiably proceed from the assumption that the Court is a unitary actor. Given that there are bound to be variations in preferences among the judges and advocates general as to their rulings’ political and policy impact, ‘the composition

---

106 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 77.
107 Schmidt (fn. 1) 174; cf Schmidt (fn. 102).
108 Schmidt (fn. 1) 174–6.
109 Schmidt (fn. 102).
110 One case where a majority of Member States have acted to restrict the impact of CJEU case law is the adoption of the ‘Citizens Rights Directive’ (2004/38/EC), which was contrary to it. Cf M Dougan, ‘The Constitutional Dimension to the Case Law on Union Citizenship’ (2006) Inter Alia: University of Durham Student Law Journal 77, 79.
of the court matters’. Can the Member States influence the Court’s position by packing the bench in their favour via the appointment of the judges – one from each Member State?

Formally, the judges’ independence must be ‘beyond doubt’ and they must ‘possess the qualifications required for appointment to the highest judicial offices in their respective countries’ – suitability criteria which the contracting parties felt it necessary to reinforce in the Lisbon Treaty via the introduction of a vetting of candidates by a panel of former CJEU judges and national courts. The Treaty also specifies that judges and advocates general ‘shall be appointed by common accord of the governments of the Member States for a term of six years’, with ‘a partial replacement’ of both every three years. While staggering the judges’ tenure is intended to ensure continuity, in practice, this means that Member States propose one judge each, and their nominations are then ratified on a quid pro quo basis. Concerns about undue national influence on judicial opinions may be heightened further by the facts that the judges’ terms are renewable – which may open them to political pressure – and that their votes are always secret, their deliberations not even recorded and no dissenting opinions published. Still, the latter has also been seen as shielding the judges from such pressure, and, given decision-making by simple majority in the CJEU’s chambers, a judge would have to hold the median position in order to make a difference, which may be quite unlikely.

The reigning uncertainty cuts both ways, however: just as the Member States may not be entirely sure of the judging majority’s preferences, the CJEU has ‘imperfect information’ about stakeholders’ likely reactions to its decisions, and, due to the ‘heterogeneous’ institutional context in which it operates, ‘it cannot foresee all implications of its rulings’. While Member State governments’ ‘shorter time horizons’ (due to their... limited political life) make them ‘less interested in the long-term implications of delegating powers’ to the Court than in ‘the immediate political salience of a decision’, the latter is also harder to predict for the CJEU, especially across 28 Member States.121 While this means that ‘the outcome of activist case law does not require an activist court’,122 an ‘often-noted strategy of the Court’ has been to ‘develop case law incrementally, … initiating new developments in cases of little relevance, so as to avoid immediate Member States’ opposition. … Once politically more contentious cases arise, the case law is already more settled, constraining political influence’.123

Overall, as ‘the ease of adopting new legislation and acquiring information about the likely action of the court goes up, the discretion of the court goes down’, which implies that the CJEU had the most ‘potential power’ earlier in the process of European integration124 – an assessment that seems to be supported by the timing of the CJEU’s early landmark decisions establishing the principles of the direct effect and supremacy of EU law in the 1960s, as well as by that of its kick-start to the internal market with the decision on the principle of mutual recognition in 1979.125

3.3 Opportunity and cooperation A third factor affecting the extent of the CJEU’s discretion is what opportunities it gets to pursue its preferences by handling pertinent cases:126 in principle, ‘courts are politically weak as they rely on being called on to decide cases and on being followed in their judgments’.127 The CJEU’s ability to act depends not least on the cooperation of national courts, who themselves exercise considerable discretion – and may act with a variety of motives – in terms of what to refer to the CJEU in the context of the preliminary 121 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 100/101, cf. Schmidt (fn. 1) 166.

---

122 Schmidt (fn. 1) 167.
124 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 76–7.
125 This in the famous Rewe v Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein (Cassis de Dijon), C-120/78, EU:C:1979:42.
127 Schmidt (fn. 1) 161.
references procedure;\textsuperscript{128} and on incentivized private actors such as firms and interest groups with the ‘resources to take actions all the way through’ to the CJEU.\textsuperscript{129} For the CJEU to exercise its full potential influence, there ‘needs to be a sufficient case load to develop case law, precedent needs to be honoured, and reasons given, allowing litigants to draw on case law to further their interests’.\textsuperscript{130}

Linked to the opportunity factor is the issue of the Court’s increasingly overwhelming workload,\textsuperscript{131} the impact of which is not entirely clear, however: delayed decisions may affect the parties to a dispute in different ways, but are unlikely to systemically favour any of them, whether institutions, Member States or other litigants. There may be more room for the CJEU to prioritize some decisions over others; however, once again the consequences are uncertain. Various measures intended to address the increased workload, such as the introduction of the Court of First Instance (CFI) in 1989 (now the General Court, GC), the shifting of a majority of cases to Chambers of three or five judges, the 2012/2013 review of procedural rules and the 2015 expansion of the CJEU, have ameliorated its ability to cope. However, the fact that up to 90 per cent of cases are now heard by the smaller chambers ‘may, to the extent that \textsuperscript{128} Cf. Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 99; KJ Alter, ‘The European Court’s Political Power’ (1996) 19(3) \textit{West European Politics} 458; Golub (fn. 75); Schmidt (fn. 1); AS Sweet and TL Brunell, ‘The European Court and the National Courts: A Statistical Analysis of Preliminary References, 1961–1995’ (1998) 5(1) \textit{Journal of European Public Policy} 66; Weiler (fn. 42) 73. The national courts’ discretion is underlined by the fact that the CJEU has seen fit to pursue a line of case law enabling it, through the invocation of state liability, to discipline even the highest national courts where they have refrained from referring pertinent questions, cf. e.g. Köbler, C-224/01, EU:C: 2003:513; \textit{Traghetti del Mediterraneo}, C-173/03, EU:C:2006:391.

\textsuperscript{129} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 99; cf Alter (fn. 90); LJ Conant, \textit{Justice Contained: Law and Politics in the European Union} (Cornell University Press 2002); but also MA Pollack, ‘Representing Diffuse Interests in EC Policy-Making’ (1997) 4(4) \textit{Journal of European Public Policy} 572.

\textsuperscript{130} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 99.

\textsuperscript{131} As of December 31, 2014, the CJEU has delivered more than 30,000 judgments (since 1952). It is noteworthy, however, that in the most recent year reported, 2014, only the Court of Justice managed to close more cases than were introduced, while the General Court and the Civil Service Tribunal did not. Moreover, it was only the second time since 2006 the Court of Justice achieved this, having (just) broken even in 2013. As a result, it has been continually carrying a load of pending cases fluctuating between 600 and almost 1000, cf. the CJEU Annual Reports.
there is variation in the opinion of judges, decrease the predictability’ of the Court’s rulings again.132

3.4 Sanctions Finally, the CJEU’s discretion may be limited to the extent that the Member States can credibly threaten and effectively impose sanctions on it. In theory, if its rulings became ‘politically too contentious’, the CJEU might ‘risk changes in … [its] institutional foundations’.133 However, in practice, ‘court-curbing mechanisms’ such as removing CJEU competences or resources or even changing its mandate are subject to the ‘joint decision-trap’.134 the difficulty to achieve the required unanimous agreement of all Member States protects the CJEU’s position, and so there is just ‘a small probability’ of Treaty change for the purpose of reigning in the CJEU.135 Hence, ‘jurisdiction stripping has never occurred retroactively’,136 even though the (initial) retention of certain policy areas (e.g. immigration and asylum before Maastricht) beyond the CJEU’s jurisdiction could be seen as an indicator of Member States’ wariness of the irrevocability and consequences of the CJEU’s taking possession of sensitive policy areas.137

IV. CONCLUSIONS

All institutions contributing to the making of EU law bring distinctive incentives and constraints to that process. Its combination of complexity, multiple and varied links among the participants and the potential for cross-issue linkages has led to the supplementation of the formal legislative procedure with informal elements, most notably the trilogue between Council, Parliament and Commission. Against this background, the CJEU plays a deeply entrenched part in the context of EU decision-making in terms of polity-construction, shaping EU law and fostering compliance with it. Although certain factors may limit its discretion, their 132 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 81, cf the above discussion of uncertainty under point II.B.3.2.

133 Schmidt (fn. 1) 161.
135 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 100.
136 Schmidt (fn. 1) 163.
137 Cf. Kelemen (fn. 112); Schmidt (fn. 1). One important policy area in which the CJEU may be observed to be exercising self-restraint in order to avoid such Treaty reforms is that of citizenship, cf Dano, C-333/13, EU:C:2014:2358. Very recently, see also García-Nieto and Others, C-299/14, EU:C:2016:114.
cumulative impact is not unequivocal. Meanwhile, with the expansion of EU competence into ever-widening policy fields, EU law has come to apply to almost all policy domains, and additional case law continues to consolidate the reach of the CJEU, for example in terms of the protection of fundamental individual rights.\textsuperscript{138}

The CJEU, therefore, has had, and continues to have, a considerable substantive impact on the development of EU legislation over time. In particular, the direct effect and supremacy of EU law has allowed it ‘to play a central role in the economic and political integration of the EU’,\textsuperscript{139} and to shape political choices via rulings in pertinent cases. In this way, CJEU case law gave ‘an important impetus’ to the completion of the single market, and the ‘same can be said for the equality of treatment of women and anti-discrimination policies in general’.\textsuperscript{140} Indeed, the combined effect of the \textit{Dassonville}\textsuperscript{141} and \textit{Cassis de Dijon}\textsuperscript{142} judgments (plus related cases), on the freedom and competitiveness of intra-EU trade and the principle of \textit{mutual recognition}, has been seen to amount to an ‘inherently deregulatory’ interpretation of primary EU law, overriding long-standing ‘social, cultural and ideological preferences’\textsuperscript{143} of Member States and other stake-holders. This has resulted in considerable political controversy, earning praise from advocates of a free internal market and scorn from critics of the EU’s alleged neo-liberal agenda.\textsuperscript{144} Similarly, the reforms of EU public procurement law are shaped by the competing and potentially contradictory aims of clarification and homogenization (equality of opportunity and treatment) on the one hand, and flexibility and market-orientation on the other hand – in addition to the ever-pervasive conflict dimension underlying all EU decision-making: the tension between Member State national autonomy and the authority of the Union.\textsuperscript{145} The CJEU’s substantive impact on EU law, in other words, can trigger significant political backlash.

\textsuperscript{138} Cf. Schmidt (fn. 1) 168; Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 85; Stein (fn. 42); G Davies, ‘Activism Relocated. The Self-Restraint of the European Court of Justice in Its National Context’ (2012) 19(1) \textit{Journal of European Public Policy} 76.
\textsuperscript{139} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 86.
\textsuperscript{140} Schmidt (fn. 1) 173.
\textsuperscript{141} \textit{Dassonville}, C-8/74, EU:C:1974:82.
\textsuperscript{142} See above (fn. 129).
\textsuperscript{143} Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 86.
\textsuperscript{144} Cf Kelemen (fn. 73); Schmidt (fn. 1) 165 and P Kunzlik, ‘Neoliberalism and the European Public Procurement Regime (2013)’ 15 \textit{Cambridge Yearbook of European legal studies} 283, on procurement in particular.
\textsuperscript{145} For discussion in the area of public procurement, see S Arrowsmith, ‘The Purpose of the EU Procurement Directives: Ends, Means and the Implications for
The EU Member States have been trying to re-assert regulatory control by strengthening the position of the European Council and maintaining the pre-eminence of the ministerial Council’s legislative role, while the Parliament is generally acknowledged to have been empowered over time (most visibly through the codification of the OLP as the default approach to EU law-making), albeit not quite to equality with the Council. Both are powerful players, and the CJEU has been faced with the task of reining them in order to balance the long-term Union interest against the more short-term preferences of Member State governments on the one hand, and directly elected members of Parliament and their party groups on the other.

The way and extent to which the CJEU has been able to achieve this task demonstrates that the benefit of the CJEU ‘in terms of a strengthened obligation attached to agreements’ comes at the ‘significant cost of a weak legislature being unable to counter unwanted case law developments’; indeed, the example of the CJEU demonstrates that ‘Courts beyond the nation-state … can surpass national constitutional courts in political significance’. The Member States and the other EU institutions have contributed to this steady increase in self-commitment: by perfecting the art of framing new legislation in language open enough to be agreeable to all, they facilitate political compromise based on language changes that may not have any legal implications. Overall, the Court is ‘a powerful constitutional and administrative body to oversee the implementation of EU law and keep the EU institutions in check’, with ‘substantial room for manoeuvre’: its political significance is the price EU Member States ‘have to pay for the benefits of an independent judiciary’.

146 Schmidt (fn. 1) 160.
147 Hix and Høyland (fn. 3) 100.
148 Schmidt (fn. 1) 162.