The phrase Climate Disaster Law was first used by Rosemary Lyster in her book Climate Justice and Disaster Law (Cambridge University Press, 2016). This book expanded the notion of Disaster Law to climate disasters. It built upon the work of other legal academics like Daniel A. Farber, Michael Faure, Robert R.M. Verchick and Lisa Grow Sun, who, following Hurricane Katrina and the events of 9/11 in the United States, established a new area of legal academic endeavour — Disaster Law. This edited collection takes the idea of Climate Disaster Law much further to investigate how it applies to four discrete areas of the law — International Law, Public Law, Environmental Law and Private Law. Rosemary Lyster and Rob Verchick are deeply indebted to the many outstanding academics who have been persuaded to contribute their discrete expertise to consider the unique challenges, barriers, and opportunities which climate disasters pose for law and policy at the international and domestic levels. This collection marks a destination along the way in the development of Climate Disaster Law scholarship and provides a pathway for understanding how the law can, and should, adapt and respond to climate disasters.

Rosemary Lyster acknowledges the University of Sydney Law School, which has supported and sustained her Climate Law research and teaching over the past 22 years. Rosemary is very appreciative of the support which her partner, Mark Lyster, has given her in bringing all of her writing projects to fruition. Her children, Kathryn and Matthew, who are building their own careers and who are deeply committed to animal and social justice, are a constant source of inspiration. Her extended family and friends have also been generous with their encouragement and tolerant of her many absences. No-one has been more instrumental to Rosemary's research and writing over the past 14 years than her researcher, Chris Cain, who has been a diligent and devoted collector, and reader, of the vast array of materials upon which she has relied. Her efforts always go way beyond the call of duty. Thank you, Chris.

Rob Verchick thanks his lucky stars for the energy and grounding he gets from his family — his wife, Heidi Molbak, and his three sensitive, creative, and hardworking sons, Reed, Ty, and Luke. In addition, he is grateful for the encouragement and support of Dean Madeleine Landrieu of Loyola New Orleans College of Law and to Stephanie Russell, faculty assistant extraordinaire, who helped with research, correspondence, and keeping the pots from boiling over.

For excellent research assistance throughout, Rob would like to thank Allison Sickle, Ben Simpson, Kirsten Valandra, and Madeline Voitier, all students or former students headed for rewarding and meaningful careers. For financial support Rob acknowledges the Louisiana Board of Regents Endowed Chairs for Eminent Scholars Program. Also, he is grateful to the people of New Orleans, who give meaning to this work every day.

Finally, our thanks go to Ben Booth, Laura Mann, Iram Satti and David Fairclough at Edward Elgar for their foresight, patience, assistance, and guidance with bringing this book to completion and ultimately to publication.
