Acknowledgements

We would like to acknowledge the contributors to this book. You are an accomplished group who generously shared your expertise and precious knowledge.

We extend our appreciation to Ron Riggio for writing the foreword and for seeing the potential in a collaborative text like this to share ideas and experiences across doctoral programs, furthering scholarship and inquiry into this topic.

This book benefited greatly from the sound guidance and support of our Executive Editor, Alan Sturmer, at Edward Elgar Publishing. We also want to thank the reviewers and the team at Edward Elgar who edited the book. We appreciate your time, effort and valuable input.

Developing an interest in doctoral leadership education through technology does not happen by chance. Numerous examples of great professors and experience in teaching courses have spurred our interest in the potential of technology to support learners as they earn a doctorate. It would be impossible to thank all the faculty, students, staff and administrators who we have learned from and who have raised valuable questions about doctoral teaching practices. However, we each extend some special thanks below.

Laura is grateful to her family and friends, especially Dave and Molly who encouraged her writing, challenged her to try new things, and provided unconditional love. She also appreciates all the teachers, mentors and colleagues along the way who sparked her curiosity and fueled her imagination. Laura is thankful for the opportunity to collaborate with Stuart, acknowledging that our shared values, curiosity, and interest in teaching and learning resulted in an enjoyable endeavor.

Stuart wishes to thank his parents for seeding his curiosity about computers and technology. He thanks Dr Karen Ortlepp for encouraging his interest in teaching and setting a great example of higher education instruction in the days before online education. Stuart would also like to thank his wife Danielle for being an ever patient sounding board for ideas. The faculty at Regent University were an inspiration and great support during his early journeys into online learning. Stuart is also grateful to Laura for being a great partner in this important project.
