As Editor, I would like to thank the authors who toiled away to produce these long chapters. All were asked to write to an agenda: to produce a solid review and then highlight some research possibilities for the topic that they were assigned. Wherever possible, they were also asked to add a lighter touch to the writing, either through examples and cases in the text, or by way of illustrations. These directives were designed to provide accessible material for readers at the advanced undergraduate level as well as suiting the needs and interests of graduate level candidates and more experienced academic researchers. Some very senior colleagues have made valuable contributions while other talented, but less well-known voices, have taken up this challenging assignment with enthusiasm and flair. I thank all for their persistence and responses to my editorial suggestions.

Additionally and importantly, I thank Alex O'Connell, Barbara Pretty, Joanna North and the team at Edward Elgar Publishing for allowing me the editorial freedom to shape this work in a slightly different way to other handbooks and compilations. I set out to do more than just compile a set of chapters about tourist behaviour. Instead, I provided a structure for the work – a transect across the tourists' journeys – and I hope this helps readers follow the flow of tourists' behaviour and experience. Some of the chapters address long-standing themes in tourist behaviour while others have a smaller research base and offer many possibilities for fresh studies.

Personal thanks are important for all authors and editors who spend time on a big project. My appreciation is extended to Samira Zare who willingly helped monitor the progress of this book. Finally, and most importantly, my appreciation is extended to Hera Oktadiana and John Pearce who provided me with stimulation, the time, and a warm family environment that helped me focus on this work and simultaneously manage my competing academic and outside interests.
