

Acknowledgements

---

The editors are extremely grateful to the chapter authors for their excellent and insightful contributions and to the reviewing team for their helpful and constructive commentaries; without their expertise, this book would not have been possible.

Sincere thanks are also due to the entire team of the European Union TRIGGER project on gender inequality in academia, including project partners, internal and external board members, expert panellists, workshop participants, Birkbeck, University of London management and administration staff, and the project team which comprised Viviana Meschetti, Jeanne Le Roux, Andrew Atter, Mark Panton, Emma Curry, John Slater, Tahani AlHarbi and Dina Mansour.

We are also grateful to all those external stakeholders who hosted TRIGGER events, or engaged with us in disseminating TRIGGER outputs through their networks; for example, the Institute of Directors and the National Athena Swan Committee, Ireland. All of this activity will help consolidate TRIGGER's legacy and, hopefully, lead to real and tangible institutional change in terms of gender equality.

Thanks are also due to the team at Edward Elgar Publishing for their helpful guidance through the manuscript preparation and publishing process.

Finally, we are especially grateful to Henry Etzkowitz for bringing the TRIGGER project to Birkbeck in the first place. It was his and his co-authors' seminal work on Athena Unbound<sup>1</sup> that inspired us.

---

<sup>1</sup> H. Etzkowitz, C. Kemelgor and B. Uzzi (2000), Athena Unbound: The Advancement of Women in Science. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.