Acknowledgments

This book is the culmination of hard work and attention from its contributors. I am honored that they chose to share their research and perspectives in these pages. Working with them in the publication process was a pleasure.

This publication would not have occurred without the support and encouragement of several individuals. First, Chris Hayter served as a sounding board, advisor, and chapter co-author as the book took shape. Chris and I share an excitement for technology transfer and intellectual property, as well as the quest to lead an authentic life well lived. It is little wonder he is my go-to academic collaborator. Second, Kim Hai Pearson graciously agreed to take on enhanced responsibility at Gonzaga at a critical time. Her selflessness and dependability allowed me spare moments to write, edit, and finish the book, not to mention gave me peace of mind when I desperately needed it. Third, Stephanie Conlin heard my complaints and always kindly reminded me to take my foot off the gas if my pace started to approach ludicrous speed. Fourth, my wife, Susan, supported my academic and administrative work as we moved from one coast to the other for my career during the middle of this project. Her unfailing spirit and grounded support, in all aspects of my life, permits me the luxury to pursue my passions.

Finally, my research assistant at Gonzaga, Emily Hazen, performed commendable work on the book over the course of her third year in law school. She expertly edited drafts, corresponded with contributors, and put up with my idiosyncratic calendar and work schedule as we moved this project to completion. Thank you, Emily, for all your behind-the-scenes contributions to this book. It is a better product because of your involvement.

The above recognitions notwithstanding, any errors or oversights in the framing or editorial work associated with this book are completely my own.

Jacob H Rooksby