One of the key themes of the book is that ‘leadership’ is a collective process, in many ways not reducible to ‘the leader’ – although much of the traditional literature does so. In a similar way, though I am the author of this book, many of the ideas and arguments it contains have been collectively generated. Without the many colleagues, students and clients with whom I have spoken over the years the questions which are explored here would have remained hidden. Certainly, without their stories, insights and curiosity this book would be much the poorer.

In particular thanks go to the people who have walked alongside me as I have formed and tussled with the text. Thanks go to Joanne Ciulla, the editor of the New Horizons in Leadership Studies Series, who first encouraged the idea of the book and who provided invaluable feedback on early drafts. Francine O’Sullivan and Ellen Pearce at Edward Elgar were careful guardians of the editorial and publishing process

A number of my students and colleagues have generously allowed me to represent parts of their own stories and read parts of the book in various stages of its development; for their generosity I am grateful. They include Ed Humpherson, Colin Owen, Patta Scott-Villiers, Lesley Seymour, and Steve Taylor. I am hugely grateful to Rita A. Gardiner, Claire O’Neill, Perttu Salovaara and Tayo Switzer for the chapters they have contributed to this Second Edition. Each of them has challenged my thinking about how phenomenology can enhance our understanding of leadership. Their chapters move the ‘leadership moment’ model on considerably and it is a delight to include their work in this text.

Finally, to my husband Robin, thank you, as always, for your constant support, encouragement and for being my best-ever ‘first reader’. I promise to be on time for dinner from now on (or at least until the next book project gets started!).
