Acknowledgements

The first and foremost people to thank are the authors of the individual chapters of this volume, for sharing their insights and analysis, for spending a lot of their time to dig up the facts and to distil the plausible from the sensational, and for analysing the intricate corruption stories in an understandable and readable manner. They should also be thanked for patiently enduring my pushing and pulling to get the final result in time and shape. They have, for instance, had to endure my incessant insistence in getting the references right. Without their effort, hard work, and conviction that this was a worthwhile undertaking, this book would never have materialised. I really hope my expressed gratitude, and our readers' prospective appreciation and the 'fame and reputation' they will get from it, will compensate for doing it all for free.

The time granted by my institute, the Chr. Michelsen Institute (CMI) in Bergen, Norway, and the encouragement and constructive criticism I have received from colleagues at the institute have also been helpful. I would guess the academic and research institutions where the chapter authors are working on a daily basis have also had to release some time for them to do this job. This has been invaluable and laudable.

Thanks also to the U4 Anti-Corruption Resource Centre, which is hosted at CMI, and the fine people working there. I served as its first director (2002–6) and have been involved on and off ever since, which has given me the opportunity to follow research on corruption and anti-corruption practice for a number of years, and it has exposed me to the work of a number of bilateral donor agencies and their partners in anti-corruption.

A number of anonymous reviewers and some of the chapter authors did a fine job on reality checks and strengthening the arguments of the various (other) chapters. Their helpful collaboration is much appreciated. Finally, gratitude is extended to the publisher, Edward Elgar, for their professional encouragements and follow-up in the process from ideas to this fine end result.
