Acknowledgments

A project like this owes many debts. First and foremost, I am incredibly grateful to the chapter authors who have offered their time, expertise, and goodwill in contributing to this Handbook. I am extremely fortunate that this group of thought leaders in the environmental politics community accepted my request to write chapters for this book. The academy offers few rewards for the creation of these types of public goods, but students and scholars benefit enormously from having high-quality reviews and syntheses of the academic literature. The authors exceeded my expectations for the chapters, and I am hopeful that their work will pay dividends for the environmental politics field for years to come.

I am also extremely appreciative of the large number of my colleagues who provided constructive feedback to the authors on initial drafts of their chapters. The list is long, and they are all equally deserving of recognition: Monika Berg, Ramiro Berardo, Chris Borick, Jessica Boscarino, Josh Busby, Deserai Crow, Charles Davis, Rick Feiock, Per Fredriksson, Teena Gabrielson, Sara Guenther, Jennifer Hadden, Diana Hernández, Peter Jacques, Roger Karapin, Tom Koontz, Hongtao Li, Bill Lowry, Ezra Markowitz, Megan Mullin, Jennifer Nash, Greg Nemet, Sara Rinfret, Jorge Rivera, Meghan Rubado, David Shafie, Darren Sinclair, Paul Stretesky, David Switzer, Manny Teodoro, and Nikos Zirotiannis.

The staff at Edward Elgar Publishing have also been a delight to work with. Rachel Downie eased my initial hesitations when she first invited me to lead this project, and then adeptly guided me through the process of designing the book. Daniel Mather provided frequent encouragement and support throughout the project. Rose Campbell provided expert copy-editing, and Stephanie Hartley, Sue Sharp, and Rebecca Stowell guided the book's production. I am grateful to them all.

And, of course, special thanks to my partner Kristen, and our two children Ben and Will, who continually inspire me to be a better scholar and person.

David Konisky
Bloomington, Indiana, U.S.A.