

Contributors

Tom Bartlett is Reader in Language and Linguistics at Glasgow University. His research brings together Systemic Functional Linguistics, discourse analysis, and social and ethnographic approaches to language study.

Daniela Caterina earned a PhD in Political Science from the University of Hamburg, Germany and is currently a Lecturer at the Department of Philosophy, School of Humanities of the Huazhong University of Science and Technology (HUST) in Wuhan, China. Her research focuses on, among others, critical discourse analysis, materialist state theory, critical political economy, European integration and Italian politics.

Michael Farrelly is a Lecturer in English Language Studies in the Faculty of Arts, Cultures and Education at the University of Hull, UK. His research develops and applies critical discourse analysis in combination with cultural political economy to policy and politics. Currently, he is developing analytical methods for charting intertextuality across social practices as a way of critically analysing networks of practice in politics and policy making.

Sarah Horrod works in the fields of applied linguistics and English for academic purposes; most recently as Senior Lecturer at Kingston University. She completed a PhD at Lancaster University in 2019. Her research brings together critical discourse studies (CDS) and Bernstein's sociology of pedagogy to explore the connections between higher education policy, and learning and teaching practices.

Nicolina Montesano Montessori is Associate Professor in the Research Centre for Learning and Innovation at the HU University of Applied Sciences Utrecht. Her research interests include complexity in education, discursive research methodology, social justice in the classroom, social entrepreneurship and social movements. She has published on Podemos, and the Indignados/15M in Spain, the Zapatista movement in Mexico and the analysis of social entrepreneurship in the Netherlands.

Jane Mulderrig is Senior Lecturer in applied linguistics at the University of Sheffield, UK. Her research uses (corpus based and multimodal) critical discourse analysis to investigate the use of 'soft power', persuasion, and 'nudge' tactics in contemporary policy and politics. She also researches the cultural political economy of education and ageing.

Juan Francisco Palma Carvajal is a Chilean Sociologist and Journalist. He has worked as a researcher at the Catholic University of Chile, as well as in the Chilean Ministry of Education. His research focuses on the politics of policymaking, citizen participation in policy processes and the changes in policymaking under neoliberal governance. Currently he is an associate teacher at the School of Policy Studies of Bristol University, while finishing his PhD thesis concerning education NGOs involvement in policymaking processes through Foucault's governmentality perspective.

Mikko Poutanen (PhD) is a postdoctoral researcher in the field of political science and political communication at the University of Tampere, Finland. His research interests include qualitative methods, such as critical discourse analysis, argumentation analysis and framing theory. His other themes of interest and expertise include ideology and hegemony theory, political communication and political economy. Poutanen is currently pursuing postdoctoral research based on his dissertation, which suggests that the homogenization of political argumentation relating to the primacy of economic and business logic has profound significance for experiences of increased political alienation and the rise of populism. He acts as the editor-in-chief for the Finnish web-journal Politiikasta, which publishes condensed, popularized scientific articles, and as the editor for Politiikka, the most prestigious peer reviewed political science journal in Finland.

Maria Rieder is Lecturer in Sociolinguistics at the University of Limerick. She is based in the School of Modern Languages and Applied Linguistics, Faculty of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences. Her research interests lie in the fields of language in the media, social and economic inequality, social movements, minority communities and intercultural communication, with a specific focus on the role of language in the production of power and social conflict.

Kristof Savski is a graduate of Lancaster University, UK, and is currently a lecturer in English at Prince of Songkla University in Hat Yai, Thailand. The main focus of his research is on how conflicts and power struggles impact the trajectories of language policies, as they are either written or implemented. Savski's published work has mainly focused on language policy in Slovenia, where he studied the trajectory of a language strategy from drafting to implementation, examining particularly how the text developed against the background of power struggles in Slovene politics and linguistics. He is currently researching the use of the Common European Framework of Reference for Languages (CEFR) as a policy instrument in Thailand, focussing on the effects that the commodification of English has on how the framework is interpreted at the local level.

Hendrik Theine is a Lecturer and independent researcher in Vienna. His research focusses on various sub-fields of political economy as a post-disciplinary research field. It spans from critical discursive and cultural perspectives on economy and public economic debates to political economy perspectives on social ecological transformation towards post-growth and degrowth societies.