This book is the product of a Korea Foundation funded project on ‘China’s roles in contributing to Non-traditional Security regarding the DPRK’, with additional support being provided by the Asia Pacific Centre for the Responsibility to Protect at the University of Queensland, the Department of Politics and International Studies at the University of Warwick and the Student Researcher scheme at the University of St Andrews.

Through the empirical research, conceptual development and collaboration enabled by this funding, the project adopted a more appropriate conceptual lens of the developmental peace. A workshop to develop the ideas and contributions of the authors was also facilitated and hosted at the AP R2P Centre at University of Queensland. A number of highly valued academics supported the project, offering insightful and helpful comments on individual chapters. Our thanks go to Alex Bellamy, Roland Bleiker, Huiyun Feng, Shahar Hameiri, Kai He, Jacinta O’Hagan and Shreya Singh. Our thanks also extend to Shaun Breslin and Chris W. Hughes who acted as mentors, providing invaluable support and assistance throughout the project. We are also indebted to our research assistant Christina Durham, who compiled the timeline in the appendix and proof-read and formatted the chapters. Last but not least, our thanks go to Arna Chancellor at the R2P centre for the administrative support provided, the team at the Korea Foundation and the University of Warwick.
