Acknowledgments

The enormous growth in the research on collaborative public management is a tribute to the significance of the study. I am indebted to all those who continue to make this field vibrant and exciting to study. Of course, I extend my appreciation to the authors who graciously contributed their research to this volume and for their patience with me through the development of this volume. For all of those whose work should be in this volume, I am confident that future volumes will include your work. The subject is that important.

A special acknowledgment is extended for Robert Agranoff, a giant in our field, who passed prior to publication of this volume. When I contacted him to contribute to this initiative, Robert eagerly accepted as he was willing to share another contribution to the field. That work appears in this volume. While this work represents Robert's last submission, his contributions to the field remain foundational and influential. Many thanks are extended to Susan Klein and Beryl Radin for completing the work Robert had nearly finished when he passed.

I also wish to thank Dean Abe Helou of the College of Business and Public Management at the University of La Verne for his continuous support of my interest in researching collaborative public management. To my faculty colleagues at the Department of Public and Health Administration, I extend my appreciation for their significant and continuous feedback on my teaching and research: Kent Badger, Suzanne Beaumaster, Marcia Godwin, Soomi Lee, Keith Schildt, Adrian Velazquez Vazquez, Matthew Witt, and Kelly Yokum. I also extend my appreciation to my students whom for over four decades have profoundly informed my research and thinking through critical feedback and comment. I have been honored to publish research with many of these students.

I also extend my warm admiration to my professors and university colleagues who guided my intellectual journey in international relations and public administration: John D. Sullivan, Franklin Tugwell, Daniel A. Mazmanian, Lewis Snyder, H. George Frederickson, James Bishop, David Waas, Robert C. Johansen, Herbert Hogan, John Jang, Ellsworth Johnson, Stuart Mandell, Robert Gilbert, and Jane Bales. I extend my deeply held appreciation to colleagues who joined with me on the journey of exploring questions of research in public affairs or engaged in initiatives in public affairs education: David Birdsell, Thomas Andrew Bryer, Louise Comfort, William A. Cook, Terry L. Cooper, Dean C. Curry, Robert Denhardt, Elizabeth Eppel, David Flatten, Lasse Gerrits, Reed Howell Gratz, Robyn Keast, Erik Hans Klijn, Christopher Koliba, Joop Koppenjan, Peter Marks, Kevin S. Marshall, Laurel McFarland, Göktuğ Morçöl, William H. Newell, Robert C. Orr, Stephen Ott, Marcos Pedlowski, Michelle Piskulich, Mary Lee Rhodes, Palmira Rios-Gonzalez, Nadia Rubaii, Craig Shinn, Kurt Thurmaier, Blue Wooldridge, and Asim Zia. To each, I owe much gratitude.

In the preparation and editing of my chapters, I wish to thank Stephanie Britt, Christine Meek, and Chelsey Carr for their thoughtful comments and contributions.

The Handbook for Collaborative Public Management would not be possible without the guidance and support of Daniel Mather of Edward Elgar Publishing. Daniel, along with Kaitlin Gray, Sabrina Lynott-May and Sarah Cook at Edward Elgar Publishing offered prompt responses to all of my questions and offered continuous support all along the way. Thanks to Edward Elgar Publishing for all of your support and making this publication possible.
