Acknowledgments

The editors gratefully acknowledge the assistance and support of the colleagues, friends, and family who supported and facilitated the development of this volume.

First, a deep note of appreciation is due to the institutions that helped produce each chapter. Accordingly, thank you to the Center for State and Local Finance, Fiscal Research Center, and International Center for Public Policy, all of which are within the Andrew Young School of Policy Studies at Georgia State University. None of the work in the book would exist without these Centers, their staff and affiliated scholars, and the Directors who have previously led them, including David L. Sjoquist, Sally Wallace, Kenneth Heaghtney, Carolyn Bourdeaux, Maggie Reeves, and Jorge Martinez-Vazquez. We further wish to thank the excellent and highly supportive departments of Economics and Public Management and Policy that house these Centers. Sally Wallace, as Dean of the Andrew Young School of Policy Studies, also provided crucial leadership during the unusual circumstances the world found itself in during the writing and processing of this volume and deserves special thanks.

We wish to thank the scholars who made this work possible, both the chapter contributors for authoring the pieces shared in this book and those who went above and beyond their role as contributors to provide assistance, including H. Spencer Banzhaf, Carolyn Bourdeaux, Nicholas Warner, Laura Wheeler, and Bauyrzhan Yedgenov. While not a direct contributor to this volume, Paul Benson, Associate Director of the International Center for Public Policy, contributed countless hours of assistance and support to bring this project to fruition and deserves more thanks than we can give.

Some of the chapters were supported by generous grants from the Andrew Young School's Dean Office, the Laura and John Arnold Foundation, and the W.E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, all of whom also have our thanks.

This volume would be the poorer without the comments and acumen of our reviewers, Robert Ebel and Roy W. Bahl, Jr. You challenged us to engage anew in our work as editors with precision, grace, and passion, and enriched this volume with your insights.

We want to thank Alan Sturmer and Caroline Cornish at Edward Elgar Publishing for their enthusiasm, flexibility, and support in producing this work. Carol Lucas provided valued copy-editing services. Creed Dunn and Aparna Reddy contributed important assistance as Graduate Research Fellows.

And, of course, we are grateful to our spouses and families for their supporting us as we compiled this important volume in such a difficult time. To the Hathaway family, the Martinez family, Sharon Love, Lucy Love, and Kyle Heidtman, thank you. The best parts of us are because of you.
