Welcome to the inaugural issue of the rebadged Journal of Legal Philosophy (JLP).

The JLP continues the Australasian Journal of Legal Philosophy (also formerly called the Australian Journal of Legal Philosophy), which has been published continuously for more than 30 years. The renamed journal is published by Edward Elgar Publishing in partnership with the Australasian Society of Legal Philosophy.

The JLP is an international journal publishing theoretical work relating to law and legal studies. It aims to be inclusive, innovative and socially engaged. The journal's main focus is on legal philosophy or jurisprudence, but it also publishes work in ethical, political and social theory that considers questions relevant to law.

The JLP's scope encompasses analytical jurisprudence, socio-legal theory and critical and continental perspectives, as well as applied work in normative jurisprudence and theoretical studies of specific fields of law. Unlike some other journals in the field, the JLP welcomes theoretical work on the law of particular nations, provided it raises wider questions that will interest readers from other jurisdictions.

The JLP has a strong and diverse international editorial board and takes an efficient and author-friendly approach to the submission process. All submissions are initially reviewed by the Editors and, if deemed suitable for the journal, are sent out for double-blind external peer review. The initial editorial review is typically completed within two weeks, while the full review process typically takes six to eight weeks.

The JLP welcomes English-language submissions from any part of the world and is happy to consider work by doctoral students. We hope readers will support the journal by submitting their work and encouraging colleagues and students to do likewise. Full submission instructions appear on the journal's website.
