The Journal of Legal Philosophy is an international journal publishing theoretical work relating to law and legal studies. It continues the Australasian Journal of Legal Philosophy, which has been published continuously for more than 30 years. The JLP is published by Edward Elgar Publishing in partnership with the Australasian Society of Legal Philosophy.

The JLP aims to be inclusive, innovative and socially engaged. Its main focus is on legal philosophy or jurisprudence, but it also publishes work in ethical, political and social theory that considers questions relevant to law. It encompasses analytical jurisprudence, socio-legal theory, and critical and continental perspectives, as well as applied work in normative jurisprudence and theoretical studies of specific fields of law.

Unlike some other journals in the field, JLP welcomes theoretical work on the law of particular nations, provided that it raises wider questions that will interest readers from other jurisdictions. The JLP has a strong and diverse international editorial board and takes an efficient and author-friendly approach to the submission process.

Submission Information

The Journal of Legal Philosophy welcomes submission of theoretical work relating to law and legal studies, including legal philosophy and jurisprudence (broadly conceived), as well as work in ethical, political and social theory that considers questions relevant to law. We invite submissions from all theoretical perspectives and traditions.

The JLP is a double-blind peer reviewed journal. All submissions will initially be reviewed by the Editors and, if deemed suitable for the journal, will be sent out for external review. The initial editorial review is normally completed within two weeks, while the full review process typically takes six to eight weeks. We aim for an efficient and responsive submission process.

The JLP invites submission of articles and book reviews. The maximum length for article submissions is 15,000 words. There is no prescribed minimum length, but articles published in the journal typically fall within the range of 8,000-12,000 words. Book reviews are normally around 2,000 words, but we also welcome submission of longer review articles.
